The business then in order was "the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois."

The question was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the amendment making an appropriation for guard fences east of the Ohio, and the improvement of the Laurel Hill descent, and that pending was the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in lieu thereof a bill to cede said road to the States respectively, through which it passes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD expressed a wish to postpone the bill, on the ground of getting a response to a call for certain information respecting it.

Mr. MASON of Ohio warmly opposed the suggestion as an indirect mode of killing the bill. There could be nothing wanting in the way of information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD wanted some information as to the cost per mile up to this time.

Mr. MASON informed the gentleman that he would find that information in a document printed at the first session of the last Congress.

Mr. BOON also insisted that the motion to postpone the bill for further information was only another mode of killing the bill, and with a view to test the sense of the House, he demanded the previous question.

On taking the second, by tellers, there was a tie, ayes 64, noes 64, but the SPEAKER voting in the affirmative, it prevailed—ayes 65, noes 64, and the main question was ordered, without a division.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the house.

Mr. BRIGGS remarked that the motion was not in order at that stage, and the CHAIR so ruled.

The question was then taken: but,

Before the vote was announced,

Mr. ELMORE appeared in his place, and asked leave to record his vote, stating that he was in attendance on a select committee, by leave of the House, when the vote was taken.

Objection being made,

Mr. E. moved a suspension of the rule; which was agreed to—113 to 43.

Mr. ELMORE'S name was then called; and that gentleman having responded,

Mr. BELL rose and inquired if the gentleman's vote varied the vote of the House?

The CHAIR could not answer the question, as the vote had not been cast up.

Mr. BELL protested against this practice of allowing gentlemen to vote by a mere suspension of the rules, instead of by unanimous consent—a practice which had grown up within the last two or three years, and was not known previously in the ten years of which he had been a member. He raised the point as one of order.

The CHAIR decided the practice to be in order.

Mr. BELL took an appeal, and the House affirmed the decision of the CHAIR—ayes 97, noes 56.

Mr. MERCER then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had suspended the rule to allow Mr. ELMORE to vote; but the motion was rejected—ayes 74, noes 89.

The vote on the engrossment of the bill was then announced as follows—yeas 96, nays 99.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. EVERETT then moved a reconsideration of the last vote.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired if a motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table would be in order?

The CHAIR replied that it would, but not pending the motion for a call of the House.

The call was then ordered, and proceeded in for some time; and 203 members having answered to their names,

Mr. PETRIKEN moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with; which was agreed to—ayes 96, noes 71.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 85, nays 112.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative, and the question recurring upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill was rejected—

Mr. RENCHER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 110, nays 87.

So the House determined to reconsider the vote.

Mr. McKENNAN then moved the previous question on the engrossment of the bill, but the House refused to second it—yeas 70, nays 79.

Mr. HAYNES said, that although he did not claim his right to address the House when this bill was taken up this morning, he could not, in justice to himself, forego the present opportunity to express his opposition to it.

We had heard, over and over again, since the commencement of the present session of Congress, of the bankrupt condition of the Treasury, and those of us who are supporters of the present Administration had been reminded as often of the necessity of sustaining the Government by a resort to its credit in the issue of Treasury notes. We had heard repeatedly of the extravagance and profusion of the late and present Administrations, of the pledge of their supporters to bring back the Government to an economical expenditure; and on no occasion, since the commencement of the present session, has so fair an opportunity been offered of acting out the professions of both sides of the House than is furnished by the bill under consideration. For his part he should place little reliance upon professions of retrenchment and economy, let them come from what quarter they may, so long as gentlemen continue to vote for appropriations which the public exigencies may not require. We have heard much declamation against profusion and extravagance in the gross, but unfortunately, when brought to the details of appropriation and expenditure, every item is earnestly and energetically supported.

In looking to the expenditures of the Government for the last few years, and the present straitened condition of the Treasury, gentlemen seemed to have overlooked some of the earliest and most efficient causes which have brought us to our present embarrassments. The original fault was here. That fault was the creation of a redundant revenue—a redundancy arising from the policy of piling one increase of duty upon another by your tariff acts from 1816 to 1828. It is thus, sir, that a redundant revenue had its origin, and the consequence has been a correspondingly increased expenditure. It may be stated as a general principle, both in public and private affairs, that revenue and expenditure will be proportioned to each other. And although the public revenue should never be greater than may be sufficient to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government; if, either by folly or any other means, a greater revenue should be created, that revenue ought to be expended, if proper and legal objects can be found upon which to make such expenditure. This Government has no legitimate power to raise revenue for the purpose of hoarding it or wasting it upon any system of corruption or favoritism whatever. How or wherefore, it is unnecessary to the present inquiry, we must borrow money in some mode or other to meet the public expenditure. What, then, should guide us in the appropriations to be made while this condition of things shall continue to exist? The dictate of a wise and considerate economy would require that we confine ourselves to such appropriations as are indispensable to the public service, and go no further. Surely the continuation of the Cumberland road is not embraced in the class of objects to which he had adverted. But he should fail in the discharge of his duty to himself and the country, if he did not reply to the often reiterated remarks heard in this House about the bankrupt condition of the Treasury. He had already spoken of the unnecessary accumulation of the public revenue as the leading cause which has brought the Treasury to its present condition. But what has become of this accumulation of revenue?

By the act of June, 1836, there had been deposited with the States about twenty-eight millions of dollars of public money. At the extra session in September last, indulgence was given to the deposite banks and importing merchants for ten or twelve millions more. But this was not all. When the Bank of the United States, the great regulator, ceased to have a legal existence in 1836, it was unable to refund the six or seven millions of stock owned in it by the Government. Thus has an aggregate amount of public money been placed beyond our reach but little short of fifty millions of dollars; and now, forsooth, because it has become necessary to borrow money, or employ the credit of the Government by the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes, we are met with the cry of "A bankrupt Treasury!" But in addition to this aggregate of more than forty millions of dollars deposited with the States, or the payment of which has been postponed by indulgence to the deposite banks, the Bank of the United States, and the importers of foreign goods, we must not forget our obligation under an act passed at the late extra session of Congress, to deposite nine millions of dollars more with the States on the first day of January next.

Sir, the amount still due from the late deposite banks, and the Bank of the United States, exceeds the whole amount of Treasury notes, issued by authority of the act of October last. In the distribution of public money by the deposite act of June 1836, about three millions three hundred thousand dollars have been received by the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the States interested in the passage of the bill under consideration. But this is not all the public money in possession of those States and the deposite banks situated within them. The deposite banks in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, yet retain, under the act of October last, granting indulgence to the public depositories, more than eight hundred thousand dollars of the public money, making in all a total of more than four millions of dollars. Under this state of things, borrowing money to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, more than four millions of the public money in possession of the States, and deposite banks, of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, is there any one who has pledged himself to an economical expenditure, who can permit himself to vote for this bill?

The debate was further continued by Messrs. C. H. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, and GRAVES of Kentucky, in opposition to the bill, and by Mr. SOUTHGATE in its support.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then renewed his motion to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill surrendering the road to the respective States through which it passed; and, having spoke a short time in support of his motion, and in opposition to the bill,

On his motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1838.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Jacob H. Holt, asking compensation for services performed as a clerk to the quartermaster at the Military Academy at West Point: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT also presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce, of the city of New York, on the subject of the establishment by Congress of the warehousing system: referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented the remonstrance of the Rev. Francis V. Badin against the confirmation of a certain land claim: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of G. Thompson, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of upwards of a hundred citizens of Pickaway county, Ohio, remonstrating against the interposition by Congress in the question of the abolition of slavery, either as it regards the States or the District of Columbia; and praying Congress to give no heed to the resolutions sent here from certain citizens of Ohio, asking the rescinding of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, which they declare express their understanding of the structure of this Government. The memorialists further allege that, the petitions which have been forwarded here from Ohio, for the abolition of slavery, have been signed by men, women, and children. The memorial was laid on the table.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Dr. Silvanus Fansher, of the State of Connecticut, asking for the establishment, by the General Government, of a permanent vaccine institution for the army, navy, and Indian Affairs: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of 2,591 women of Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia: the motion to receive it was laid on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate copies of any reports which he may have received from the Auditor of Pennsylvania made by the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States since the 1st day of January last.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill to authorize the Commissioner of the Patent Office to issue a patent to Angier March Perkins and John Howard Kyan;

The bill granting a pension to David Gilmore;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of John Campbell;

The bill authorizing the appointment of four additional clerks in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs;

The bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, directors of an association called the New England Mississippi Land Company;

The bill authorizing payment to be made to the Missouri volunteers, whose horses were lost or cast away at sea on the voyage from Tampa Bay to New Orleans;

The bill for the relief of the children and heirs of William Fisher, deceased;

The bill for the relief of Melancthon T. Woolsey;

The bill for the benefit of the Levy Court of Calvert county, in the State of Maryland; and

The bill for the relief of Thomas Cushing.

The resolution submitted by Mr. KING, providing for the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of June next, was taken up, and, after some conversation, in which Messrs. KING, HUBBARD, GRUNDY, CALHOUN, PRESTON, and NORVELL, ordered to a third reading—a motion to lay it on the table, made by Mr. NORVELL, having failed.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. TIPTON addressed the Senate at length in favor of the provisions of the bill. He took a philosophical and very humane view of the condition of the Aborigines—the causes of their decline, as civilization approached, and the deep necessity there was for the Government to interfere for their protection, and the amelioration of their condition. He maintained that the red sons of the forest were susceptible of the highest state of cultivation. It was only necessary to give them a Government and laws suited to the condition of their respective tribes, to advance them in the mechanic arts, and give them a knowledge of agriculture, to insure all the best wishes of the Government towards this unfortunate race. Mr. T. concluded by moving to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next. [The speech will be given as soon as prepared from the Reporter's notes.]

Mr. WHITE spoke of the necessity there was for the passage of the bill, and expressed his very ardent desire that when it again came up, the discussion would be continued until the subject was finally disposed of.

Mr. LUMPKIN expressed a wish that the whole Senate would turn its attention to this matter. He felt convinced that, when Senators came to look into this bill, it would not only meet their views, but also those of every considerate gentleman in the country. Mr. L. had the most entire confidence that this Government had the power (as he knew it had the desire) to extend to the remnant of this once mighty and chivalric race all the lasting benefits of agricultural improvement and civilization: nay, he even looked forward to the day when they might become part and parcel of ourselves, advancing with the same rapid strides in the pursuit of knowledge, wealth, civil liberty, and all the other requisites for human happiness and human comfort.

The bill was accordingly postponed, and made the order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said there was a bill laid on the table yesterday which some of its friends would like to call up. He alluded to the bill which had been partially discussed, in relation to preventing the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and other securities of corporations created by acts of Congress which have expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought the bill might be brought up sooner, probably, than the Senator from Kentucky anticipated. It was one of great importance, and he wanted time to prepare and consider the subject properly. When it was brought up, he would like to hear the Senator from Kentucky, or any other Senator, justify the reissuing of the notes of the old Bank of the United States after its charter had expired.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, with regard to any justification to be entered into by him, the Senator would not be gratified. All he (Mr. C.) desired to see was, what Senators in that body were prepared to assert the power to justify the features of that bill.

The bill to establish a board of commissioners to examine claims against the United States was taken up; and after some remarks, in which it was supported by Messrs. GRUNDY, PRENTISS, HUBBARD, and BUCHANAN, and opposed by Messrs. PRESTON, STRANGE, and CALHOUN, the bill underwent several amendments; after which,

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN,

It was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, April 19, 1838.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Peter Bargy.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Jesse E. Dow.

Mr. FRY, from the Cammittee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Mary Uptegroff, of Butler county, Pennsylvania.

Mr. AYCRIGG, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Trueman Kellog.

Mr. THOMAS then asked the House to take up the motion to reconsider the vote granting leave of absence to Mr. SMITH of Maine, from and after the first of May next, but subsequently waived the motion on the ground of Mr. S's absence from his seat.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The House then resumed the consideration of Mr. HOPKINS's resolution to appoint a select committee to inquire into the expediency of separating the public press from Government patronage.

The question was on the amendment of Mr. DROMGOOLE to extend the inquiry, [as printed in last night's Globe.]

Mr. WISE continued his remarks. He said, in reading the papers this morning, he observed in the amendment of his colleague, what had escaped him on hearing it read, viz: a proposed inquiry into the expenses of the investigating committees of the last Congress. To this Mr. W. had no objection; but he could inform his colleague that there was no necessity to raise a special investigation for that purpose, since the majority of one of those committees at least had been very diligent in ascertaining the amount. Whatever it had cost had not been thrown away; for the partial developments these committees had been able to make were worth far more than they cost. But Mr. W. still held the Administration responsible even for those expenses, because its conduct rendered the investigations necessary. He hoped the gentleman would extend his inquiry to the Executive departments of the Government; for even with the limited means in their power, the last two investigating committees had effected more good than the late Administration for the whole eight years of its existence.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said when he submitted his amendment he had intended to have accompanied it with some explanations, which, if his colleague had not succeeded in getting the floor first, would have rendered much that he had said unnecessary.

Mr. WISE would apologise to his colleague, for he was really not aware that Mr. D. desired the floor.

Mr. DROMGOOLE replied that no apology was necessary, for he did not complain of it. On the contrary, he returned his thanks to his colleague for the prompt support he proposed giving the amendment.

The resolution originally submitted by another colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS,] referred to abuses that had been practised in that House, and the increase of expenditures in reference to the public printing, and the particular subject to which Mr. D. proposed to extend the inquiry of the committee, seemed to him to be appropriately and directly connected with the subject his colleague proposed to investigate. Let the inquiry be a faithful and comprehensive one into all these matters, and he was willing that it should be made, and that it should be ascertained whether the manner in which the patronage of that House had been bestowed, in reference to the appointment of public printer, was such as to render it necessary that they should, in future, disconnect the office of printer to the House from any one having a connection with a public journal.

It had occurred to Mr. D. as probable that the mover of this resolution, as he had not heretofore advocated this disconnection, had been led to the conclusion of the necessity of it in this instance from some circumstances occurring at the last election of printer, and therefore Mr. D. deemed it very proper to embrace an inquiry into that matter, particularly when, immediately after that election, it was announced in another journal (the National Intelligencer) that the printing would not be executed by the individual elected as printer to the House, but by themselves. In addition to this, there were prevailing rumors up to this time that the printing was not performed by the nominal printer, but by others. This alone would render his amendment very proper on an inquiry of this character.

Before he went into an explanation of the reasons that had especially induced him to ask for this information, Mr. D. begged leave to advert to one or two remarks made by his colleague [Mr. WISE] yesterday. The gentleman had made some allusions to the spirit of the amendment, and to the spirit in which it was offered. Why the bare fact that his colleague gave it his prompt support, ought to be at once an irresistible evidence that it contained nothing improper either in its spirit, tendency, or purpose. Had Mr. D. conceived it open to a contrary interpretation, he would not have offered it, for he endeavored, at all times, to observe decorum and propriety, and never to be guilty of a violation of the rules of the House. His colleague's own advocacy of the amendment, however, admitted his own opinion of its propriety.

But to what useful purpose could they apply this amendment? It was proposed to inquire whether the individual elected by the House to perform certain duties by himself, does perform them or not. If he does not, and still receives the emoluments of the office, is it not clear that he holds a sinecure, which should be remedied? If it should turn out that this individual has received a sum in gross for the office, does not the question naturally arise whether it is not a sale of office? If the fact shall appear that he receives a sum in gross instead of the clear profits of the office, and that those who perform the work receive the balance of the profits after paying him this sum, and which reimburses them, is it not clear that the rates of printing, as at present fixed, are too high, and ought to be reduced? Hence, then, it seemed to him that the information called for was necessary, in every point of view. Whether it shall turn out that there was any bargain or agreement between these persons or not, he could not positively know. He only knew what rumor said. If the existence of such a bargain should be disclosed, he did not know whether it would be considered improper or not. It ought, however, to be known, with all the circumstances connected with it, and then the House would be enabled to judge if there was any thing improper in it, or if it called for any legislation to guard against a similar occurrence in future.

The subject presented itself in another point of view. If an individual came there to seek office, at a time when he was notoriously and avowedly unprepared to fulfil its duties, did it not present the question whether he had not perpetrated an imposition upon the House? In all these points of view, therefore, Mr. D. insisted the inquiry embraced in his amendment was a very proper one. It was simply whether an officer of that House had performed his duty. Indeed, he understood there was no objection to it, except by the nominal printer himself, which was very natural.

Now in reference to other topics embraced in the amendment, what was proposed? It was proposed to ascertain the expenses incurred in consequence of the appointment of investigating committees, not for the purpose of casting any reflection whatever upon them, but how these particular items of expenditure have increased, Mr. D. ascribed, though others differed with him, to the improper and erroneous proceeding on the part of the House, and, of course, he embraced all of every party in it who sanctioned the clothing those committees with too much power. It was known that Mr. D. had opposed the clothing these committees with the power conferred upon them of sending for every individual throughout the community at their own will. In doing so, he held that they placed an improper construction, though he believed they were sustained in doing so by a majority of the House, upon their power to send for persons and papers, which they construe into the power to send subpœnas for witnesses. Now he maintained not only that the committees had no such power, but that the House had not itself the right to confer any such power on them. Subpœnas could only be issued by the House on ascertaining the names of the witnesses, which might be furnished by the committee. This, he believed, was the long established and invariable usage of the British House of Commons.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia said, that, as he was a member of the first investigating committee referred to in the amendment proposed by his honorable colleague and its chairman, it was proper that he should state, that, when he was first applied to, to issue a subpœna for a witness, he declined, and sent the subpœna to the SPEAKER, who also declined, saying it was the duty of the chairman. In this opinion, upon an interview with that officer, Mr. G. acquiesced, and issued all the subpœnas which went out during the investigation.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he blamed no one, but spoke of it as a practice that had grown up and ought to be corrected; and with a view of correcting which, he desired the information he had moved for in his amendment. He understood that these investigating committees had not only exercised the power of sending for witnesses, if they pleased, in any part of the country, without their being named to the House, or the materiality of their testimony appearing, but they had gone still further, and issued commissions to take depositions when and where they pleased. Now he maintained that it was the grant of this latitudinous power, and the exercise of it, which had produced a very great accumulation of expense, which would not have occurred, if the House had taken what he held to be the proper course, while at the same time it would be giving more security to the peace and comfort of the citizens at large, and greater security to individual liberty. It was in the hope then, by showing how the expenses of the House had accumulated, and the amount of those expenses, that the House should become convinced of the error of this novel, and what he held to be objectionable practice. That was his object in wanting this branch of the information. The same remark would also apply, with equal force, to the information called for in reference to investigations by the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was another item of some importance. He alluded to the expense for printing a large edition of the rules and orders of the House, together with Jefferson's Manual; how many copies he did not recollect; one or two thousand, he believed. Now it would appear, from investigation, that this would turn out to be a large sum; and the House ought to guard against it for the future. The idea which at present suggested itself to his mind was, that the copies should be preserved for the future use of the members, as the property of the House. They might be deposited in the library of the House of Representatives, and members allowed to take them out, and return them at the end of each session. This would save the expense of another edition of this work.

It would be seen, then, continued Mr. D. that all the information he called for was with a view to some practical and beneficial result, and with no view to criminate any one, for the whole had grown out of the erroneous practices of the House itself, which had led to extravagance and abuses.

Mr. MERCER reminded his colleague that in reference to the publication of Jefferson's Manual, that work had been made a part of the rules of the House where it did not conflict with them.

Mr. DROMGOOLE was fully aware of it. He believed his colleague was chairman of the commitee which reported the revised rules, and the order adopting Jefferson's Manual as a part of them; and it was upon the gentleman's motion, also, that the printing of the large edition of that work took place. It was, however, with no view of attaching blame to any one that he sought for information on this point. It was to prevent the recurrence of so large an expenditure in future. The matter had presented itself to his mind, and he thought it not an improper subject for the attention of the proposed select committee, but within the range of the original resolution.

In what he had proposed, Mr. D. said he had no design of precluding the mover of the resolution from going into the most full and ample investigation into all other subjects he chose. His colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] proposed, Mr. D. believed, to provide by law for preventing the employment of any conductor of a political journal to execute the public printing. Whether he should ultimately concur with his colleague in that object, he could not then say. He should hear the reasons for it, and be governed accordingly. It must take strong reasons, however, to induce him to vote for any law proscribing any individual, or class of individuals, from carrying on their work. If it was wrong to elect the conductor of a political journal to do the public printing, the House could apply the corrective at the time of the election. They might refuse to vote for him on that ground, but he was not disposed to pass a proscriptive law.

Mr. D. said he did not blame the zeal of his colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS,] who moved the original resolution, for desiring to withhold all the Government patronage from political journals, but it would be recollected that a short time before a colleague of theirs [Mr. PATTON] vacated his seat, he had proposed, under the direction of the Library Committee, that there should be a very large subscription to a political journal, (Niles's Register,) which would amount, according to the best calculations, to upwards of $12,000 per annum. Mr. D. was opposed to the adoption of that resolution, and voted to lay it on the table, and it was but a reasonable conclusion that all who voted as he did were also opposed to that proposition, and that all who voted against the motion to lay it on the table were in its favor. If Mr. D. was not mistaken, his colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] voted against laying it on the table. Now this was a proposition that was a direct proffer of Government patronage to a political journal, and, moreover, looked pretty much like a squinting of censorship over that political journal, for the Clerk of the House was directed by it to supervise the work, make indices, &c. Mr. D. did not mention this circumstance, with a view to show that there was any inconsistency on the part of his colleague, but to show that those who claimed of the baneful influence of Government patronage over the press sometimes gave votes which looked very much like it. He knew it to be very common for gentlemen to talk about the corruption of the press by the patronage of the Government, and he knew it to be, also, very commom to talk about the venality of editors, and of a subsidised press. Now all this may be very true, but if it was, it was equally applicable to all political parties. How far the election of printer for that House may have that influence he could not tell, and whether it produced that effect or not he would not undertake to say, but the rumors and charges of this corrupting influence were constantly reiterated. But was it confined to one party alone? Why he had seen a charge going the rounds of the public press that an effort was making to buy a public press, to be published in this city, and a circular was said to have been distributed over the signatures of some members of the House, soliciting contributions and support for it. This was one of the charges in currency, but he professed to know nothing either of its truth, or propriety, if true. Such charges, however, would always be reiterated by every political party against each other.

He would briefly advert to one remark made by his colleague [Mr. WISE] yesterday, in reference to another subject. His colleague had referred to Mr. D. as one of those belonging to what was denominated the Divorce party; that party which was in favor of the Independent Treasury bill. Now he did not complain of this allusion of his colleague, but he was at some loss to perceive the connection between that question and the one now before the House. Mr. D. however, had no objection of avowing, at this or any other time, his opinions on that subject. He was one of those who wished to organize the Treasury of the United States upon its constitutional ground, and to disconnect it entirely and wholly from its union with State institutions. He believed good policy required it, and he believed it to be according to the spirit and intent of the framers of the Constitution that it should be so. He believed it to be according to the settled purpose and design of the institutions of Virginia that the business and operations of each Government, State and Federal, should be kept separate and distinct, and that that great State rights principle was violated by their connection. So jealous was Virginia on that subject, that she had expressly provided in her Constitution that no officer of her's should hold any appointment under the Federal Government; such was her jealousy of any union of the two Governments, and her determination to keep them separate and distinct. Mr. D. unhesitatingly avowed that he was one of those who went for an entire separation between the revenues of the Federal Government and the State banks. When that important subject came up, Mr. D. hoped to have an opportunity of giving his views upon it more at length, and he flattered himself that he could give satisfactory reasons to his constituents for the course he should take. At present he would say no more, for it was not pertinent to the subject under consideration; but thus much he felt called upon to say, from the allusion made to him by his colleague. He concluded by expressing a hope that the amendment he had submitted would be adopted by the House.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia then obtained the floor, but gave way to the ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, in respect to the construction of a bridge over Blue river, at Knightstown, Indiana.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, a communication from the same, in relation to a claim of Nathaniel Taylor for a Cherokee spoliation.

On motion of Mr. CARTER, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of revenue of each State and Territory for 1836.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. EVERETT begged leave to propound an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means as to when he proposed to bring up the Seminole appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated, in reply, that he should be compelled, from necessity, to ask the House first to consider a bill which was, in fact, to carry into effect the bill of October last to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, the bill, at present, being abortive. He did not expect that bill to take up much time, and he should take the very earliest opportunity thereafter of calling up the bill referred to by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. EVERETT then asked the House to take up and consider the following resolution, as it called for information on the subject of the bill referred to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the amount paid, and of the amount of arrears on account of, the expenses of the Seminole war; and an estimate of the sum necessary, in addition to the former appropriation, to pay such arrears and for carrying on said war until the first day of June next.

Objection being made, Mr. E. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. McKAY informed the gentleman tha the information had already been furnished, printed, and laid on the tables of the members.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 101, nays 70, not two-thirds.

Mr. LINCOLN then asked the House to resume the consideration of the bill to pull down the walls of the new Treasury building.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was compelled to object to it, for he could not consent to allow the public business to give way to less important matters.

Mr. LINCOLN moved a suspension of the rules, but it was rejected without a division.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland Road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois." The question pending being on the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report, in lieu thereof, a bill to surrender said road to the States respectively through which it passes.

The bill was opposed at length by Messrs. UNDERWOOD and RHETT, and advocated by Messrs. CUSHING, and CALHOON of Kentucky, when

Mr. CLOWNEY obtained the floor, and, on his motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, April 19, 1838.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. A. Van Buren, his private secretary, transmitting certain surveys and examinations relative to light-houses, called for by the resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant—and,

On motion of Mr. DAVIS it was laid on the table.

The CHAIR announced a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, copies of three statements made by the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, at the commencement of the months of February, March, and April of this year; which, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY, was laid on the table.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the proceedings of the citizens of Rahway county, New Jersey, on the subject of the Independent Treasury bill: laid on the table.

Mr. S. also presented several petitions, one from Philadelphia, and the others from New Jersey, praying a reconsideration of the Cherokee treaty: laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of John H. Wheeler, superintendant of the Branch Mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, requesting increase of compensation for the officers of that institution: referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution fixing the day for the adjournment of Congress was taken up.

Mr. GRUNDY thought it would be better to postpone the passage of this resolution until a more convenient season. There was no period in the history of the Government when more important business was before the national legislature than at present, and not to perfect at least a greater portion of it, might be looked on as remissness on our part. If the resolution were to pass the Senate it would then be under the control of the other House. He thought it would be better not to decide at this early day. When the bulk of the business was finished then it would not only be proper, but in some measure our duty to do so. He would therefore move to postpone the subject, say until Monday week, at which time he thought the Senate would be better prepared to act. He was aware (as was judiciously observed the other day by the Senator who introduced the resolution) that when a day was fixed both branches of the legislature were usually more expeditious; and that it did, in some measure, stimulate them to extra exertion, and after the period specified by him in his motion had elapsed he would have no objection to take up the resolution and act definitely on it. He was as anxious as any man to get away, from private reasons, but he was willing to make all matters yield to the paramount duties of a public station.

Mr. PRESTON hoped the question would not be postponed. He thought with the gentleman, that it would stimulate both Houses to additional exertions. So far as the Senate was concerned, he believed the time set forth in the resolution would be ample to finish all the subjects; but with regard to the other House, he was not prepared to say that the business of the country might not require a somewhat longer period. At all events, it would be better to show that body that we were ready and anxious to adjourn by the time fixed on by the joint resolve. Mr. P. here took a glance at the numerous bills of importance which had been matured by the Senate, and sent to the House of Representatives, which had not yet been acted on there. He alluded to the measures of finance for which the extra session had been called, and the time already spent of the present session on those subjects, and others of national importance, which were either laid on the table, or were still sleeping in the popular branch. If nothing further was to be done for the relief of the country, it was time to adjourn. On that matter the Senate seemed to have terminated its labors. The Independent Treasury bill brought forward by the Committee of Finance was dead and buried, and it would require a power little short of omnipotent to raise that new Lazarus from the tomb! What further new and untried experiment did they contemplate? If none other, and the Administration thought it had done all that was necessary, and meant to leave the result to the people, then it would be time to adjourn. But if the Executive intended to suggest, or the Administration, or any of its friends, meant to bring forward any measure calculated to relieve the country from its embarrassment, he would vote with pleasure for the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

[Mr. GRUNDY said: I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not understand me as having made any reference or allusion to any thing connected with that measure.]

Mr. PRESTON was anxious that something should be done, in order that the Government might no longer go on in its present broken down and decrepid state, exhibiting the melancholy example of a young Government grown prematurely old, decrepid, and weak. He would be glad to see any remedy suggested, by those having the control of affairs, that would save the country from its present embarrassment. He would unite most cordially with them, and come forward in the full spirit of patriotism to their relief; but if no such measure was contemplated, the sooner we went home, and appealed to our masters, the people, to give us a lesson, the better!

Mr. WRIGHT observed that he had contented himself yesterday, when this subject was before the Senate, with giving a silent vote, without occupying its attention with any remarks; but as he hoped the Senate would sustain the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee to postpone the resolution for a short period, he proposed to occupy the attention of the Senate very briefly, while he explained why, in his opinion, they ought to do so. He certainly would not go into any political discussion in reference to the propriety of not fixing the day of adjournment at this time; but he would recount very briefly the business which they had sent to the other House, and which had not yet received the final action of that body.

Mr. W. then referred to the Independent Treasury bill; the bill for the increase of the army; the bill granting pre-emptions to actual settlers on the public lands; and the bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands. None of these four important measures had met the consideration of the other branch of the National Legislature. They had been told by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] that the most important measure, that in relation to the currency, was dead—had been put to rest forever in the other House. He could not think so. There was no doubt but the House of Representatives felt as deep a conviction of the necessity of acting on that great question as was felt here; the evidence of which feeling was shown in a two months' debate.

But suppose the Senator was right—that a majority of the House of Representatives were opposed to the views of the Executive; were they opposed to all action on the subject matter? Far be it from him, Mr. W. said, to express an opinion as to the views and opinions of a majority of that body; but he hoped and believed that they felt imperatively the necessity of some action on this deeply important question, and that they would not adjourn without it.

Again, no bill had been acted on in either House of Congress to make provision for the Southern Indian war. He had been informed that the House was in daily expectation of taking up that bill; and the intelligent gentleman from whom he obtained the information anticipated a debate on the subject of some weeks. Some of the ordinary appropriation bills, also, were yet to be reported.

It might be said, that if the Senate passed this resolution the House could amend it, and fix its own day in reference to the business they had to act on; but, said Mr. W. shall I fix a time for them to adjourn that I believe to be too short; and thus, virtually, say to the country that the House will be negligent if it does not finish its business by a certain time? If it could be shown that the two Houses could get through with the important business of the country by the day named in the resolution, he would be as ready to fix the time of adjournment as any one; but as he did not believe that they could now act judiciously in this matter, he hoped that the motion to postpone the resolution would prevail. Mr. W. concluded by asking for the yeas and nays on the question, which were accordingly ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN said, when he voted yesterday for the adoption of the resolution, he voted on the ground that we had ample time to finish all the business by the first Monday in June. If, however, the action of the Senate were to be construed as expressing an opinion that the measure of finance, which had been so ably discussed in this branch, was not to be taken up in the other House, he should give no vote to countenance any such impression. He sincerely trusted the House would feel it an imperious duty to act on that measure, yea or nay. He would consider it a national calamity for Congress to adjourn without adopting some definitive measure in relation to this business; and he should, therefore, move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. KING said that when he gave notice of his intention to introduce this resolution, he distinctly stated the grounds on which he proposed to offer it; which were that the Senate might turn its attention to the propriety of an adjournment at as early a day as the business of the country would justify, and that the House of Representatives seeing that the Senate would be able to get through with their business by a certain day, might turn their attention to the business before them, and fix their day for adjournment, in reference to the probable progress of that business. With this understanding, the resolution was taken up, and he voted for it on the grounds he had stated. But the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, placed the subject in a different position. If it was the design of a minority of the House of Representatives to defeat the important measure referred to by the Senator from South Carolina, by delaying it till too late to be acted on—if it was their design to stave off the business of the country by procrastination—if that was the design of the Senator, and those who acted with him in voting for this resolution, he Mr. K. could not go with them. If, as the Senator said, the House of Representatives were opposed to this measure, why let them vote against it, and take the responsibility; but he could not consent that it should be defeated, by delaying till the day fixed by the Senate for adjournment, and then throwing part of the responsibility on the Senate. He should, therefore, vote for the postponement or laying the resolution on the table until he saw the game that was to be played.

Mr. HUBBARD said he would prefer the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] to postpone the subject to a given day. When the question was taken the other morning on laying the resolution on the table, he had voted against it, because he did not wish to countenance the opinion that the Senate would not be ready to close its session on the first Monday in June. It struck him as most proper to propose some day certain for acting on the matter, and then if business warranted, we could take it up. He Mr. H. presumed no man was prepared to say that the session should close until some definite action was had on the bill alluded to by the Senator from South Carolina—he believed there would be a definite action in favor of the bill from that body, or one of the same nature introduced in the other House.

After some further remarks from Mr. PRESTON, the question was taken on Mr. GRUNDY's motion, and it was carried—yeas 25, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, and White—16.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to cause, for the term of one year, each officer employed in the collection of the customs, to keep a daily account, in writing, of the time he is actually employed in the public service each and every day, and what his employment each day is, stating the same so much in detail as to exhibit a clear and intelligible account of all his services from day to day.

Resolved, That such memoranda as is made by each and every officer, shall be quarterly sworn to as a full, just, and complete account of the services actually rendered, and the time actually spent by him in public employment.

Resolved, That the memoranda of each district be embodied together for the use of Congress, and that the Secretary add to it the amount of tonnage entered, cleared, or owned in such district; with the amount of revenue collected therein, and the expense of collecting the same; showing what each officer receives for all such services.

Resolved, That where any officer discharges, or claims to discharge, the duty of more than one office, his services in each shall be distinguished, as well as his compensation.

Mr. NORVELL presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, protesting against the annexation to the United States of Texas, or of any district of country lying west or south of New Orleans: laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the Senate took up the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and securities of corporations created by Congress, which have expired; and, after a debate, in which Messrs. NILES, WALL, GRUNDY, SMITH of Connecticut, PRESTON, and RIVES took part, and amendments, on motion of Messrs. RUGGLES and NILES, the bill was laid over informally; and

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which, it

Adjourned.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House till the expiration of the hour, when the orders of the day were called.

The special order was the bill to establish a commission of claims.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to postpone it, in order to proceed with the public business.

Mr. BOON expressed a hope that the motion would prevail, so that they might go on with the Cumberland Road bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said as the public business was so important, he must be compelled to ask for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 139, nays 46.

So the rules were suspended.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

The question was on the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report, in lieu thereof, a bill to surrender said road to the States respectively through which it passes.

The bill was opposed by Messrs. CLOWNEY and PICKENS, and advocated by Mr. CORWIN, when

Mr. CASEY then rose and said that this was a bill of the deepest importance to the interests of his State, and though he was prepared, and indeed desired an opportunity, to address the House in its support, yet, believing it had already been sufficiently discussed, he was willing, for the sake of securing its speedy passage, to do what he had never done in that House before. Sir, concluded Mr. C. I move the previous question.

Mr. PICKENS then moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put, which were ordered, and were—yeas 108, nays 86.

So the House determined that the main question be put.

Mr. MONTGOMERY then moved an adjournment. Lost.

Mr. REED asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, (the engrossment of the bill) and they were ordered, yeas 100, nays 95.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. RHETT then moved a call of the House: lost.

Mr. CONNOR asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were—yeas 96, nays 80.

So the bill was passed.

On motion,

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia concluded his remarks on the resolution of Mr. HOPKINS, proposing to raise a select committee to inquire into the expediency of severing the public press from Government patronage.

The question pending was on the amendment of Mr. DROMGOOLE to extend the inquiry, (as printed in Wednesday night's Globe.)

As soon as Mr. GARLAND had got through,

Mr. THOMAS moved to consider, at this time, his motion to reconsider the vote of the House granting leave of absence to Mr. SMITH of Maine, from and after the first of May.

Objection being made, Mr. T. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 87, nays 92. Not being two-thirds, the motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the bill for the establishment of a Board of Commissioners of Claims, be made the special order for Friday next: lost.

PRIVATE ORDERS.

The House then passed to the private orders.

The first was the "bill for the relief of the representatives of Dr. Philip Turner, deceased."

The claim involved in this bill was for interest on a commutation in 1808, which, having been first rejected, was afterwards allowed, and two weeks ago the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole, with the enacting clause stricken out. The question was whether interest should commence from the time a claimant presented his claim, or from the time he established it. The opponents of the bill contended for the latter, on the ground that the onus probandi was on the claimant; that the Government did not seek its debtor, but was always ready to pay when the proof was made out; and that the previous rejection of this claim was prima facie evidence that it had not been then made out. Another objection was raised on the application of the statute of limitation.

The advocates of the claim, in reply to the latter argument, insisted that the Government had no right to avail itself of such a plea in bar to a claim upon it, because the claimant was no party to the limitation; and to the former it was contended that a subsequent admission of the petitioner's claim established his right to it on his previous application.

It is understood that the settlement of either principle will operate upon a large number of claims for interest that have been before the House for years. When up before, the discussion had occupied a large part of the day in Committee of the Whole, Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont, having solely sustained the argument in opposition to it, when his motion to strike out the enacting clause prevailed.

Mr. PETRIKIN, with a view to bring the House to a vote, moved the previous question, but it was not seconded.

The claim was now sustained by Messrs. CRAIG, SHEPPERD, TILLINGHAST, WISE, and HALEY, and opposed by Mr. ALLEN.

Mr. HALEY, at the conclusion of his remarks, moved the previous question.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved a call of the House.

Mr. GLASCOCK asked for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered, and the House refused the call.

Mr. DAWSON moved an adjournment: lost—ayes 62, noes 68.

The demand for the previous question was seconded—ayes 75, noes 49, and the main question was ordered; and thereon

Mr. ALLEN of Vermont, Mr. CUSHMAN, and Mr. GRIFFIN simultaneously rose and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 75, nays 76.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. GRIFFIN moved an adjournment.

Mr. TOUCEY asked the gentleman to withdraw it, to enable him to make a report from the select committee, which Mr. G. declined; and the motion to adjourn was rejected—ayes 70, noes 72.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. TOUCEY then rose and informed the House that the Committee of Investigation were now ready to report, and that they had unanimously directed him to move that its consideration be postponed till next Monday fortnight, and that it be printed. He therefore asked leave of the House, at this time, to make the report.

Mr. ROBERTSON was not prepared to say, at that time, whether he should vote for the proposition to print.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that that proposition was not before the House, but a simple application for leave to report. When the report came in, then the gentleman might discuss the question to print, if it should be moved.

Mr. POPE objected to granting leave, and said he thought it rather a strange proceeding to print a report of this character, and postpone it for two weeks. He would be willing to receive it on Monday morning, but not to postpone it.

Mr. TOUCEY moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. PECK moved an adjournment: lost—ayes 73, noes 80.

Mr. POPE said he would withdraw his objection; but there were others made, and the House suspended the rules.

Mr. TOUCEY then submitted the report, and moved its postponement till Monday two weeks, and that, in the mean time, it be printed. He repeated that he made the motion by the unanimous direction of the committee.

Mr. GRENNELL then, on leave, submitted the views of two of the minority of the committee, (Mr. RARIDEN and himself,) and then moved that they take the same direction as the other.

Mr. ELMORE rose, and, on leave, submitted his own views, which he moved to take the same direction. He remarked that he had not been able to agree with the views either of the majority or the minority; and, therefore, he presented such views as struck him to be proper; but, although the committee disagreed, they concurred unanimously that he should present them to the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON said, if he understood the proposition submitted by the chairman of the select committee, (Mr. TOUCEY,) he must again repeat that he was not prepared to vote for the printing of the reports, or any one of them. The questions involved in this matter were of the most deep and profound importance, not merely to those who, it is supposed, may be implicated in this report, but of vast importance to the privileges of the House itself.

Mr. R's attention, he said, had been that morning, from an intimation thrown out that the report would probably be made, drawn to the consideration of the question, what course, in the event that these reports should be offered, it became the House to pursue to protect the privileges of its members; and, unless he had greatly mistaken the doctrine of the parliamentary law upon this subject, it would be their duty to recommit all these reports to the committee which had brought them in, with special instructions that, if any member was implicated at all, to report that single fact to the House, for he was satisfied they could not move one step further until they received the order and direction of the House. He may have misunderstood the parliamentary law upon this subject; but he begged leave to refer to an authority of the highest character, whose work they had made a part of their own rules, where it did not conflict with them—he alluded to Jefferson's Manual. In that celebrated book it was laid down that when a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him.

If Mr. R. recollected the terms of the order charging upon this select committee the investigation of the matter which had been before them, it gave them no authority to adopt any resolution, or to furnish any evidence to that House, which might implicate any one of its members. The very moment, under this rule of parliamentary law, the fact became disclosed (and such he understood to be the case) that a member of the House was involved in the examination before the committee, that very moment it was their duty to have communicated it to the House, in order that the House might take such direction as it saw fit.

Mr. R. admitted that he had turned but very casually to the authority cited by Mr. Jefferson in the above passage; but as far as he had gone, he found that it covered even much higher and broader ground. It was affirmed in debate (see "Grey's Parliamentary Debates," the work, we suppose, referred to by Mr. R.) to be a privilege beyond the power of any committee, or beyond even the power of the House, to charge any committee with the power of investigating any thing touching, or affecting, or involving the privileges of the members. It is there said to be the privilege of the House alone, where any member has a right to interrogate, and where it is the privilege of the member implicated also, and that he can only be interrogated and examined by the House.

Mr. R. did not pretend to know what was the extent to which the large volume or volumes of testimony laid before this committee might go. He only spoke from conjecture, and with a view to draw the attention of the House to this matter, at least before they attempted to print what none of them, or but those composing the committee, knew the contents of, whereby they might be spreading before the public documents containing statements, and resolutions of a committee, involving the rights and privileges of members of the House, contrary, as he understood the parliamentary law, to the provisions intended to secure them. He had no idea, either, that any member of the House would concur in the propriety of printing them till they had been read, and supposing that to be the proper course, and that it would be well to afford time for considering the other question, he moved to lay all the reports upon the table, in order also that the House might take time on a question so momentous and important, to reflect upon the course which ought to be adopted.

Before the question was propounded,

Mr. MALLORY moved an adjournment, which prevailed, and accordingly

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, April 23, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

The first business in order being a privileged question, was the report of the select committee, on the subject of the late duel, made on Saturday last, and the motion of Mr. TOUCEY, under the unanimous direction of the committee, to print and postpone the further consideration thereof till this day fortnight.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON withdrew that motion, and after some remarks against the motion to print and postpone, and substituted another to refer the whole subject to a committee to be denominated the Committee of Privileges, with instructions to report to the House what course, in their judgment, it is proper to pursue.

Mr. R. concluded with the expression of a wish that, should his motion prevail, he might be excused from serving on the committee.

The original question to postpone taking precedence,

Mr. TOUCEY addressed the House for some time in support of that motion.

After a few words from Mr. MENEFEE and Mr. WISE,

Mr. GLASCOCK advocated the motion to postpone and print, the latter especially, as an act of justice to all the parties implicated, both in and out of the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON again opposed both motions, and insisted upon the propriety of his own, to refer the subject to another committee.

Mr. ELMORE vindicated the course the committee had felt themselves bound to pursue under the instructions given to them by the House, and went into a brief examination of the case cited by Mr. ROBERTSON, from Grey's Parliamentary Debates, showing that it did not apply to the one before the House. He referred to the resolution raising the select committee, in which they were peremptorily ordered to do what they had done. If Mr. R's objection was a valid one, it should have been made at the time that resolution was before the House.

Mr. THOMPSON opposed the printing, and reprehended the course the committee had taken, as transcending their powers, on the ground taken by Mr. ROBERTSON, that the question becoming one of privilege, all proceedings before them should have been estopped as soon as the fact of a member of the House being involved was disclosed.

Mr. JENIFER objected to the postponement that the committee had not confined themselves to a statement of facts, and facts alone, but had presented an argument, and had charged a member with being guilty of a breach of privilege. The postponement would allow the report to go out to the country, and would operate to create prejudices, and perhaps false opinions, long before a cool discussion in the House could prevent a reaction. If the subject was ever to be taken up, it should be done at once, as soon as the report could be printed, which might be done by to-morrow morning, as it was undoubtedly in the hands of the printer, who had already made extracts from it. He then moved that the whole subject, except a bill to prevent duelling, be laid on the table, and that that bill be taken up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER said there was no such bill in possession of the House.

Mr. JENIFER modified his motion, so as to strike out the clause relating to the duelling bill; and, at the request of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ELMORE,] withdrew it, to permit him to make an explanation.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, then obtained the floor, and refused to yield it for the explanation; but proceeded to say, that he cared nothing about the postponement, but insisted on the propriety of printing. It was necessary for the House to know, before they could consider the subject properly, what the report contained. If there was any thing wrong in the report, if the committee had transcended their powers, the House ought to know it, which they could not do if the printing were refused.

Mr. DUNCAN replied to the objection that the committee had transcended their powers, that it should have been made at the time the committee was instructed. If a special report had been required, they should have been directed to make one. They had been instructed generally, and now, having reported generally, it was too late to object. He was in favor of the printing, that the House might know what the report contained. It was said that members of the House were implicated—that there was a bill on the subject of duelling, but he knew of no charge implicating any member or members, nor of any bill on this subject. When there are rules of the House, they ought to be obeyed, but when an investigation is ordered in general terms, the report ought to be made in general terms. He thought the best course was, to adopt the motion to postpone and print; and was opposed to the motion to refer to another committee, to ascertain if any member of the House is implicated, because it would cause needless delay, and perhaps prevent the action of the House upon the whole subject.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said he would not express his opinion upon the merits of the subject now, but would wait till the report came in another form before the House. He was in favor of the motion to commit the report to another committee, to ascertain if any member of the House was implicated; and if such was the case, it was proper that the witnesses should be examined before the House, before a member should be deprived of a seat in the House, which he considered higher than any station or privilege that could be conferred by the Government.

Mr. MENEFEE called for the reading of the resolutions.

Mr. ELMORE then said he should call for the reading of the whole report.

Mr. BELL objected to such an unnecessary consumption of time, and thought the matter now stood precisely where it should rest, until the question had been decided whether it was improper for a committee to proceed against a member, without being specially directed to do so by name. The fact has been announced by the chairman of the committee, that certain members have been proceeded against; and the question should be decided before the House took any further steps, whether that proceeding was improper.

Mr. MENEFEE said he called for the reading to establish the fact alluded to; and went on to argue that this was a subject on which the House ought to be particularly careful. He considered the proceedings of the committee irregular, and contrary to the rule of the Manual, which had been adopted and made the law of the House. He wished the trial of a member to be open before the House, when the witnesses could be subject to cross-examinations; and contended that the testimony taken in secret by the committee could not be used in a trial before the House, and therefore ought not to be printed and circulated.

The SPEAKER intimated that these remarks ranscended the proper limits of the discussion upon the motion before the House.

Mr. MENEFEE only alluded to the fact that the report could not be used, to show that it ought not to be printed.

Mr. LEGARE wished to ask how far it was proper for a committee in secret session to try a member of the House.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to go into that inquiry on a motion to print.

Mr. LEGARE, with all deference to the CHAIR, thought if the rules of the Manual were laid down as the law of the House, it was necessary to look into the practice of Parliament, to look to the practice of this House in other cases, and to look at the fundamental principle, that, when a person is accused, he is to be confronted with his accuser and with the witnesses.

The SPEAKER replied that that would be very proper when the report should be before the House; but on an incidental motion to print a paper it was not in order.

Mr. MENEFEE concluded with an argument to show the impropriety of going on to implicate a member before a committee.

Mr. THOMAS briefly stated the distinction of the cases arising under the parliamentary law laid down by Mr. Jefferson, as originally cited by Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. T. contended that its application was where a committee, charged with the examination of a subject, discovered, in the course of their investigations, that a member of the House was incidentally charged; but the present case was altogether of a different character, for the fact that members were implicated was notorious, the committee specially raised with reference to it, and they were specially directed to inquire into it. Mr. T. had voted for the original resolution, as he believed that common sense, as well as parliamentary law, which was founded on common sense, required that the result should be placed on the documents of the House.

Mr. FILLMORE opposed the printing of the report, on the ground, as he stated, that it was composed of ex parte testimony, taken in the absence of the party accused, and of the trial of a man for a criminal offence, without his having had an opportunity of hearing that testimony.

Mr. TOUCEY corrected the gentleman's statement. The committee had tried no one, and the persons supposed to be implicated had been allowed to call witnesses, and to examine and cross examine them. No one had been tried.

Mr. SIBLEY likewise opposed the printing, inasmuch the minds of the triors might be prejudiced by reading the testimony. Mr. S. was for having the witnesses examined at the bar of the House.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said, that some two months since a matter of very great importance, both to the House and the country, was referred to a select committee, with instructions, substantially, to gather the facts in the case, and to report thereon to the House. That committee, after having been industriously engaged nearly two months in prosecuting the object of their appointment, have finally reported. The usual motion is now made to print this report for the use of the House; not an extra number for distribution among the people, but the usual number merely for the use of the members; and this motion, much to his astonishment, had met with the most zealous, and, indeed, he might say, the most violent opposition. The objection seemed so strange, that he could hardly believe, at first, that it was to be seriously persisted in. It would be strange, indeed, if the House, after having instructed a committee to investigate a particular case, collect the facts, and report thereon, and for this purpose arming them with power to send for persons and papers, should refuse to hear that committee when ready to render an account, or, in other words, refuse to receive and print the report. The three fourths of this House who voted for the appointment of this committee, are now asked to yield to the one-fourth—to undo what they have done—to admit that they had no authority to appoint this committee for any such purpose as that with which it is charged, in the opinion of a large portion of the House; or, if there be no want of authority, either on the part of the House or committee, that the latter shall not be heard—that the report shall be committed, without printing, to another committee, to be called a Committee of Privileges, who are to report what further steps shall be taken by the House. Are members prepared to treat this committee thus contumeliously? Is the House prepared to admit so readily that it has acted without authority, or unadvisedly? Is it disposed to sanction any such child's play as this course proposes? I trust not, said Mr. F. but hope that the report will be printed, and the matter will be permitted to take its usual course.

The first objection to the printing of the report of the committee, is made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] on the ground that the committee have exceeded their authority. It is contended, that when it was ascertained that a member of the House was implicated, it was the duty of the committee to have reported that fact to the House, and a paragraph from Jefferson's Manual is relied on as authority. It reads thus: "When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon, the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him." Now, sir, said Mr. F. we are to look at this as reasonable men, and to inquire what was really and truly intended by it—not what can be made out of it either by a strict or liberal construction, but what was meant. Looking at it with this view, it would seem to be plain and palpable, that it was intended to embrace cases where matter pertaining to the ordinary affairs or business of the House is referred, and in the course of the proceedings of the committee, it "proves" or turns out that the character of a member is implicated; in which case, the committee is to arrest all further proceedings, and report that fact to the House. It was where it "proved" incidentally, or turned out that the character of a member was involved, that this course was to be pursued, and not where the very object of instituting the committee was to investigate a case in which it was well known that members were implicated, and whose offences constituted the very gist of complaint and investigation. This, said Mr. F. seems to be the fair, common sense construction of the rule alluded to; it could not, he thought, fairly be construed to preclude the House from submitting a matter to a committee, and authorizing them to proceed in its investigation, even though the House should be well informed at the time that a member of the House would be implicated in such investigation. Now, what is the fact here, sir, said Mr. F.? Why, the House well knew, every member knew, that certain members of the House were implicated in the transaction at the time the committee was appointed. But it is said the rule is imperative; that as soon as the committee ascertained that members of the House were implicated, they should have immediately reported that fact to the House. Why? To what end? Did the House need to be informed of that fact? Did it expect, when this committee was appointed, that it would summon witnesses before it, ask one question, receive one answer, and then come into the House, and report that a member was implicated? Will any gentleman say he voted for the appointment of this committee with any such views? I cannot, said Mr. F. believe that the House intended to set on foot, or participate in, any such miserable farce. If, therefore, the rule from Jefferson's Manual stood alone, he could have no hesitation as to its construction, being fully persuaded that it was not intended to apply to a case of this kind. But it does not stand alone; other matters are to be considered in connection with it, to wit: the resolutions by which this committee was appointed. It is a fair and legitimate mode of construing a rule, to look at other rules upon the same subject. Now, so far as this case is concerned, the resolution may be regarded as a rule of the House; and if these conflict, which must give way? The resolution was adopted last, and may therefore be fairly regarded, quoad hoc, as repealing the rule: it, at least, rides over and controls it. So that even if the rule from Jefferson's Manual does require a committee, under certain circumstances, to suspend their proceedings and make a special report to the House, the resolution of the House appointing this committee may be regarded as directing the committee, under those same circumstances, to proceed with the investigation without making such special report. If any other construction be adopted, then this rule in Jefferson's Manual will effectually deprive the House of the power of departing from it, or adopting any rule inconsistent with it. It will render nugatory that provision in the Constitution which says that each House of Congress "may determine the rules of its proceedings."

The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] and others, have interposed a constitutional objection; that is, that the accusers here have a right to be confronted with the witnesses against them, and that the House have not the power to invest a committee with authority to examine witnesses and collect testimony in a case of this kind. Now, sir, on recurring to the Constitution, it will be perceived that this phrase, "to be confronted with the witnesses," relates altogether to cases of criminal trials before a jury. It has no reference whatever to examinations had by this House. The same Constitution authorizes this House to punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, two-thirds concurring, to expel a member; and this without the intervention of a jury, or rigid adherence to any of the rules prescribed for such cases. The gentleman says the examination of witnesses should have been before the House, and not before a committee. Sir, that argument should have been made when the committee was appointed. The House had the power to adopt either course. It decided in favor of the examination by a committee. This argument, therefore, is now out of place.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] thinks the committee have transcended their powers by reporting resolutions against certain persons, members of the House. They were to inqure, said he, into the causes that led to the death of Mr. CILLEY, and the circumstances connected therewith. Nothing is said about persons, and therefore the committee had no right to report against persons. Now, if the transaction which the committee were to inquire into could have occurred without the agency of persons, then, perhaps, there might be some foundation for the argument. But there not only must have been, from the nature of the case, persons implicated, but the House well knew it when they ordered the committee. To believe that the House expected the committee, in this case, to report the circumstances, saying nothing about persons, must require a very considerable stretch of credulity, to say the least of it. Such a position, I am persuaded, said Mr. F. can find no favor in the mind of any member of this House.

Another gentleman from New York [Mr. SIBLEY] has deprecated the printing of this report, because of the apprehended undue effect it might have upon the minds of members who are to be the triors, in case any other evidence should be laid before the House. He thinks we should have all the testimony together, or not at all. Is it not a little singular, that the gentleman should anticipate other evidence, when the committee have been at work collecting it for near two months; the accused, as we are informed by the Chairman, being present, and having the privilege of cross examining the witnesses, and now making no intimation that they have other testimony. It seems to me, said Mr. F. to be taking a good deal of pains to pick up objections and to throw difficulties in the way. Suppose the rule of the gentleman from New York should obtain in our courts, what would be the consequence? Why, the witnesses must all testify at the same time, or at least there must must be no adjournment of the court until all the testimony is out. Such a position, it is apprehended, cannot be sound. From the very nature of most cases, the evidence must be received by piecemeal; but no one ever thought that this rendered the court and jury incapable of doing right. And are we willing to admit a fear that, by receiving this evidence, when other evidence is to follow, our minds will become so warped by it, as to prevent our doing what is right? I cannot, said Mr. F. believe this of any member of the House. I trust, said he, we shall be able to examine all the evidence, and to decide upon it fairly, and according to the true merits of the case.

But the gentleman seems to be much troubled to know what we shall do provided there should turn out to be other evidence. What course, said he, will the House take? He [Mr. S.] would be glad to have some gentleman inform him who knew more upon the subject. Without pretending to any superior knowledge upon this subject, Mr. F. said he might be permitted to say that the case appeared very plain to him. If one of the gentlemen charged should rise here in his place, and say that he had newly discovered evidence which he wished to place before the triors, the House might think it best that the whole matter should be recommitted to the committee, with instructions to receive the new evidence, and report it with the rest to the House; or the House might think it most expedient to receive the additional evidence without such recommitment. It was perfectly competent to decide which course was best. But it is hardly worth while, said Mr. F. to be devising means to rid ourselves of difficulties which have not, and probably will not, occur.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] deprecates the sending out this report to prejudice and poison the public mind before it can be accompanied by the arguments and explanations of which it is fairly susceptible. It will be forestalling, he thinks, public opinion upon this subject. The first answer to this is, that the report of the majority will not go alone, but will be accompanied by two minority reports. Again, sir, it may be asked if there be any danger of submitting the facts in this case to the people, even though they should be unaccompanied by our commentaries. For one, sir, I think, said Mr. F. that the people are entitled to the facts in this case, and that they are capable of forming an opinion upon them, unaided by us. There can be no danger that truth will work wrong to any one, and this is one of the last cases in which it should be shut out from the public.

That the committee have not exceeded their authority in this case, it may be stated, in addition to what has before been said upon this point, that their course is sustained by precedents. They were required to investigate and to report thereon. Under this, they were clearly authorized to report a resolution of expulsion, if they deemed the facts justified it. But another argument, used by some gentlemen in the course of the debate, appears to be conclusive upon this subject. It is derived from the fact, that great numbers of petitions and proceedings of public meetings, calling for the expulsion of all who were concerned in the late duel, have been presented to this House, and by the House referred to this committee. Here there is authority for the course of the committee, if not to be found any where else. I will indulge the hope, said Mr. F. in conclusion, that the objections to the printing of this report will not be pressed further. It is a case in which the whole public have manifested a deep interest, and are now indicating a strong desire, and he could not but regard it as a laudable one, to have the real facts in the case.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, referred to the resolution by which the committee was instituted, and said it intimated no charge against any member of the House. The committee was simply directed to inquire into the causes of the death of a member of the House; and was not even required to report upon that subject.

Mr. TOUCEY said the gentleman was mistaken—the resolution put into the hands of the committee, required the committee to investigate and report. report.

Mr. GARLAND read from the printed journal, to show that the resolution, as modified, and finally passed, did not require the committee to report, that clause having been omitted.

Mr. TOUCEY explained that the resolution given to the committee, did require a report upon the subject to be investigated.

Mr. GARLAND said he read from the printed journal, and he took that to be the record of the House. He then went on to urge, that the committee ought to have stopped at the rule of the Parliamentary law. If a member was charged with an offence against the privileges of the House, be must be arrested by the Sergeant-at-arms, and has a right to be heard in his place or at the bar of the House. This was the common right of the meanest criminal, in courts of justice; and also, if any individual should commit a breach of the privileges of the House, he has the same right to be brought up and heard at the bar; and he contended that the members of the House were entitled to the same right. He referred, for illustration, to the practice of courts and grand juries, to keep the facts and testimony of a case secret, to prevent an improper influence on the public mind; and argued that, in this case, the same course should be pursued. While he hoped a strict investigation would be had into the entire merits of the whole case, he was unwilling that the testimony should be published, so as to produce influences prejudicial to an impartial spirit, and calculated to prevent a fair and candid investigation by the House and the community.

Mr. BRIGGS insisted that the law, as laid down by Mr. Jefferson, was binding and imperative, and was not ridden over, as contended by Mr. FAIRFIELD, by the resolution of the House directing the investigation. He was clearly of the opinion that the committee had transcended their powers; and coming to that conclusion, he could not assent to he printing of their report.

Mr. TURNEY replied to an objection to the publication, that it would blast the reputations of the individuals accused, by urging that the suppression of the report, with the view of saving their reputations, would have a much more injurious effect. He thought it better to let the whole truth go to the public, and then a just decision would be made. He was opposed to acting in relation to the substance of the report, or the action of the committee, without having the report read, and having the arguments the committee may have to offer in support of the course they had taken. Mr. T. went on to argue from various principles of law, as well as from the expediency in this case, in favor of printing the report, and replied to the suggestion that grand juries are sworn to keep their proceedings secret, that it applies only to their own secrets, and those of the prosecuting attorney; but it was of every day's occurrence that grand jurors were called into court to testify to what certain witnesses had sworn to before them. He was in favor of postponing and printing.

Mr. CUSHMAN regarded this as one of the most important questions to which the attention of the House had long been drawn, and it was therefore but proper that every thing should be heard upon it which could be suggested when they went forth to the country. But the question then before the House was, whether the report of a select committee, appointed for a special purpose, should be postponed to a day certain, and then taken into consideration, and in the meantime be printed, or not. That was the only question then under consideration, as he understood.

Mr. C. was in favor of this motion, and he should agree with the gentleman from Virginia in the propriety of the motion submitted by him, provided this was such a case as was contemplated under the law cited by the gentleman. But the present had no analogy to such a case. If the House should direct one of its committees, or should raise a select committee, for the purpose of inquiring into a particular subject, such as the investigation of a contract, &c. and it should turn out, on the investigation, that a member of the House was implicated, he coincided with the gentleman, that the moment that fact was disclosed, it became the duty of the committee to report it at once to the House, in order that the member might be informed thereof, and have an opportunity of defending himself. This, however, was not such a case, because the terms of the resolution directed them to the speciel duty, and the fact about which they were to inquire was notorious. In conclusion, Mr. C. asked, how it was possible, unless this report was printed, to give these gentlemen a fair, candid, and impartial trial.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the CHAIR if a motion to recommit the report, with instructions to the committee to strike out the resolutions with which it closes, to strike out all the argumentative part of the report, and to report only the facts to the House, would be in order?

The CHAIR said that motion would not be in order till the one pending was disposed of.

Mr. ADAMS then said that not only were the privileges of the members, but the privileges of the whole House, and the privileges of the constituents of every member, staked on the issue of this case; and so far from postponing the subject for a fortnight, he wished that the House would take up no other subject, until they had decided on this. He said he should vote against the postponement, and wished to be considered in so doing, as dividing the question. Should the motion to postpone be rejected, then the motion he intended to offer, would be to strike out the resolutions and all the argumentative parts, and to report the facts. If the facts implicated any members of the House, let them say so, and then the members implicated would come properly before the House; at present, he thought they were exceedingly improperly before it. If members are to be censured or expelled, it was necessary to act with caution; and it behooved the House to protect itself from a violation of its privileges, and to bring members before the House in regular and proper order.

Mr. A. thought the committee had entirely transcended its power. He said nothing was contained in the resolution to indicate that any member of the House, or any other person, was to be tried by the committee; and he contended that the House had no power to delegate any authority to the committee to try any member, for it was the privilege of every member to be heard and tried by the House itself. He also insisted on a strict construction of the rule in Jefferson's Manual, as necesary for the security of the rights of members and their constituents. He cited some authorities, and referred to the case of Hon. John Smith, in the Senate, during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, in support of the ground he had taken. He hoped there would be no delay in proceeding to an examination of the facts; and if the course he had indicated should be taken, there would be no need of printing at present, because the report would go to the committee to be amended.

Mr. ELMORE then moved an adjournment, but gave way to

Mr. CAMBRELENG, (the above being passed over,) on whose motion the two bills in relation to the issuing of Treasury notes, then, in Committee of the Whole on the Union, were re-committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then, by direction of the same committee, reported a "bill to carry into effect the act approved the 12th of October last, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes;" which was read twice and committed.

Pending the proceedings of the day, Mr. BELL gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote of the House on Saturday last, by which the "bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. Philip Turner, deceased," was rejected; which was entered on the journal.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, A. Van Buren, Esq. communicating a report from the Secretary of State on the attack upon the steamboat Columbia, by a Mexican armed vessel, in the gulf of Mexico.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, April 23, 1838.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, presented the proceedings of sundry citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, against the Independent Treasury bill: laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR announced a communication from the President of the United States in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 7th February, 1838; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, presented the petition of a number of the citizens of that State, who have purchased reservations allowed to Creek Indians, under the treaty of March, 1832, praying that patents may be issued directly to the last purchaser, or assignee, instead of being issued, as now done, under the regulations of the Executive, to the Indian, or first purchaser only; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. C. also, presented the petition of John M. Moore, chief clerk in the General Land Office, asking addition compensation for extraordinary services rendered, in said capacity, under the pre-emption laws, and as acting commissioner of the General Land Office: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. KING presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Alabama, relative to patents to purchasers of Creek reservations, similar to the one on the same subject just presented by his colleague, and which was referred in like manner.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the memorial of the Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Wilmington Railroad company, on the subject, reported a bill to remit the duties on certain railroad iron imported by said company: read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which had been referred the memorial of Laurent Millandon and others, of New Orleans, reported a bill to authorize them to import an iron steamboat, in detached parts, free of duty; which was also read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill to authorize George Whitman, of Alabama, to import an iron steamboat, in detached parts, with the necessary machinery, &c. reported the same with an amendment; which was read.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of the Board of Trade of Wilmington, Delaware, in opposition to the making New Castle a port of entry, and of George Thompson.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which had been referred the bill to extend the charter of the Bank of Alexandria, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. NORVELL, on leave, introduced a bill making an appropriation for the completion of certain roads in Michigan; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. KING, on leave, introduced a bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad company; which was read twice, and referred.

The bill to prevent the reissuing and circulation of the bills and notes, and other securities, of corporations created by Congress which have expired, was taken up and read the third time.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate at length, in favor of the bill.

Messrs. PRENTISS, and CLAY of Kentucky, severally spoke against it;

And after some further remarks from Mr. BUCHANAN, in reply to Mr. CLAY,

The question was taken, and the bill was passed—yeas 27, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Trotter, Williams, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis King, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, White—13.

The following bills from the House were severally twice read, and referred:

The bill making appropriations for the construction of the Cumberland road, in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

The bill for the relief of ——— Benning.

The joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase a site in the District of Columbia for a new magazine and keeper's house.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, April 24, 1838.

Mr. HOWARD, on leave, made a statement in reference to the report of his remarks of last evening on the subject of the President's message on the outrage upon the steamer Columbia. He had not said that negotiations were pending in relation to that affair, for such was not the fact, but that the more delay there was, the more time would be afforded to the Mexican Government to make explanations.

THE LATE DUEL.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. TOUCEY, made under the unanimous direction of the committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the late Mr. CILLEY, to print the report of that committee, and postpone it till next Monday week.

Mr. ELMORE, one of the committee, who was entitled to the floor, commenced by defending the committee from the censure cast upon them for transcending their powers, so far only as the taking of testimony was concerned.

Mr. ROBERTSON disclaimed, in what he had said, as having expressed any opinion that the committee had intentionally violated their duties or transcended their powers. He did not censure them in that spirit, but merely maintained that they had so transcended.

Mr. ELMORE continued, and remarked that the debate, as it progressed, was based upon an assumption of facts which did not exist, viz: that a trial was had, and no opportunity afforded for cross-examination. He had also been misunderstood as vindicating the course the majority of the committee had taken. So far as he agreed with them, he desired no other vindication than a statement of the facts. So far as he differed with them, he was prepared to stand by that difference, and sustain his own position. If any vindication of the majority was necessary, he presumed they were able to defend themselves.

Mr. E. then went into an examination of the objections that had been urged against the committee for taking testimony, and cited the case of Senator Smith, of Ohio, which went much farther than this. He said, as a member of the select committee, he felt compelled to go into the examination, and to investigate the evidence, with a view to ascertain whether a breach of the privileges of the House had been committed, or not; and he never felt himself able to answer that question until the testimony was closed; and then, upon an examination into that testimony, he was prepared to report that the privileges of the House had been violated, and by whom; but he was not prepared to go further, and report any resolution as to what should be the action of the House thereupon. So far he differed from the majority. He had no particular objection to any course the House might be disposed to take on the question of postponement.

Mr. LOOMIS remarked that the first question was, had the committee gone into an examination, or taken the slightest particle of evidence, not having a bearing upon the subject they were directed to investigate? That was not averred. But it was said that the committee had transcended the powers of such a committee, and, if they had done so, which he maintained they had not, whose fault was it? Not of the committee, but of the House. The House had armed them with power, and directed them what to do, and the country was awaiting the result of their investigation with the deepest anxiety, as might be inferred from the mass of petitions that had been sent there on the subject.

Mr. L. also went on to show that, in reporting the resolution, the committee had only performed its legitimate functions; for even if the resolution was silent on the point, the many petitions sent by the House to them, containing, as they generally did, a prayer for the expulsion of certain persons, were in the nature of obligatory instructions to report some definite action, in case the testimony sustained the allegations set forth.

He then went into a review of the case of Armstrong, cited by Mr. ROBERTSON, from Grey's Parliamentary Debates, showing, first, that it was at least a bad precedent, if it applied; and, secondly, that it had no applicability to the case now under consideration. To declare the resolution under which the committee acted void, would be not only to suppress all this investigation, but to deprive themselves also of the power of investigation. No one complained of the partiality or corruption of the committee, and he expressed himself at a loss to perceive any good reason for resisting the motion to print.

Mr. GRENNELL remarked that some suggestions had not been noticed. The motion to postpone and print had been made by the unanimous voice of the committee, as had been usual with the reports of select committees. The committee, he thought, had transcended its powers in the report, and it might be proper for the House to stop and set the committee right; but whether the motion of the committee should be adopted or not, depended upon other considerations. He referred to the rule of the Manual, and contended that the resolution was in strict conformity to that rule and law of the House, which he did not believe, as had been argued by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LOOMIS,] was to be treated as a mere dictum, or marginal note, imported from abroad, and therefore not binding. On the contrary, he considered it equally binding as any other part of the law of the House. It was, then, the duty of the committee to report in conformity with the law of the House and the resolution under which they acted. They were called upon to examine the facts and make proper deductions, and that, and that only, was in their power. They had gone farther, and reported arguments, and rules for the final action of the House; but they should have stopped short at a statement of facts reported to the House.

In conducting the examination, it would probably never appear that the gentlemen implicated had substantial notice to appear before the committee as persons charged, to defend their rights, or bring them directly before the House. They had received notice to appear, but it was not such notice as to put them on their guard as if on trial before their peers; and this was important, because they were delicately situated, with their rights, privileges, and characters at stake. They should have the benefit of all doubts; and he thought, that when they came in to answer to this decision of the committee, it was a judicial decision, involving judicial powers; that they would be put unfairly before the House. For these reasons, he thought the committee had exceeded their powers. He concurred in the opinion of his colleague, [Mr. ADAMS] that this report should be printed, and laid on the tables of the members only in the form of evidence. The members implicated should have every advantage yielded to persons accused in courts of justice. Mr. G. then referred to the argument that the memorials and petitions referred to the committee enlarged their powers beyond the resolution, and contended that they had no effect upon evidence, but only showed a certain state of public opinion, which could not govern the committee or the House in their particular action, though no man held in higher respect than himself, the expression of the public opinion from various sections and large masses of people; but he thought no one could pretend that petitions praying for the expulsion of a member were to govern the action of the House unless supported by evidence, and that in accordance with the laws of the House. The petitions are entitled to full respect, for they come from people actuated by the best motives; but it is the duty of the House to protect itself, to punish for contempt, and to proceed in such matters with all the caution and solemnity of courts of justice, according to law and evidence, not being swayed by public opinion from strict justice.

Mr. G. commented upon some of the precedents referred to in the debate, and pointed out differences between the respective cases. He concluded by saying that he had concurred in the motion offered by the chairman, but he was satisfied that the argument and results ought not to be printed, and unless those parts of the report were stricken out, he should feel compelled to vote against the motion.

Mr. TILLINGHAST remarked, that he would not be supposed inclined to suppress investigation. He was anxious that the country should be informed of the course of the House in the debate, of the state of each question, and of the reasons assigned by each gentleman for his action upon the subject. He pressed upon the House the importance of the results involved in the inquiry, and urged the members to forget their own individuality, and to act upon high grounds of moral and legal principles. He contended, at length, for a strict construction of the rule in the Manual, and replied to some of the arguments used in the course of the debate, urging that it was the duty of the committee, so soon as they found a member implicated, in the course of their investigation, to stop at that point, and report that fact to the House. He was opposed to postponement, and in favor of the proposition to recommit.

Mr. POPE referred to former cases of privilege in Congress, in which he had participated many years ago, and insisted that no precedent existed, within his knowledge, of a committee prosecuting an inquiry into the conduct of a member of Congress or a Chief Executive officer, under a general power to inquire. They must have the special authority and sanction of the House before they could advance a step. The case of a member was a much stronger one than that of the highest functionary of the Government; for, in expelling a member, they were depriving twenty, or perhaps fifty, thousand people of their voice and vote in that hall. Moreover, the committee had further transcended their powers in sending for Mr. GRAVES, Mr. WISE, and the other persons implicated. It was also understood that the report and testimony had been printed, and he would like to know on what authority that had been done.

Mr. GRANTLAND (a member of the committee) would inform the gentleman. It had been printed at the request and solicitation of the minority of the committee. The chairman and the majority at first objected to it, but, at the earnest request of the minority, they assented.

Mr. ELMORE was understood to make a similar statement; adding that that course was sanctioned by the investigating committees of the last Congress, and, in the present instance, was intended for the benefit of the gentlemen supposed to be implicated in the investigation.

Mr. TOUCEY stated that when the resolution to print the answers of the witnesses, etc. was adopted, which was understood to have been with a view to the accommodation of others, Mr. T. was absent, as was also the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. POTTER.] As soon, however, as the knowledge came to him that the clerk of the committee had been authorized to employ a printer, he [Mr. T.] acquiesced in it; and a printer was so employed by their clerk, and the evidence was printed, as he before stated, for the accommodation of those gentlemen whose situation was supposed to require it.

With regard to the report of the majority, it was drinted upon the motion, and at the urgent solicitation, of the minority, in opposition to Mr. T's wish, and in opposition to his suggestions. It was printed and put into the hands of the members of the minority, and upon it they had framed their counter reports.

As to the publication of what had appeared in one of the city papers, (the Globe) it might be proper to state that Mr. Rives, of the firm of Blair and Rives, was the printer employed by the committee, and hence had access to the report. That gentleman spoke to Mr. T. about it yesterday, apologizing for what appeared in the Globe, stating that he supposed, as the report had been made, that the usual course upon it had been taken by its being ordered to be printed, and, therefore, that there was no impropriety in publishing the substance of the resolutions.

Mr. POPE resumed, and opposed the motion to postpone and print. He was for quashing the report, recommitting it, without printing, to a Committee on Privileges, and let them report what, in their judgment, ought to be done.

Mr. PARKER remarked that the objections made to the report were not offered by the persons interested, but by the members, the judges, they were the persons who, with a slight technicality, objected that the course of the committee had been irregular. The only question he thought was, whether the House, as judges, should obtain all the information in their reach, to enable them to decide correctly. Without the knowledge contained in the report, the House could not determine what kind of examination this committee had instituted, whether there had been an ex parte investigation, or whether witnesses had been examined on both sides, and cross-examined. He examined the original resolution, with a view to show that the committee was authorized and required to investigate all the facts, and report thereon; and he contended that this involved the necessity of reporting conclusions.

Mr. P. contended that it was proper to print the report entire, in consequence of the urgent appeals of the community for an investigation; and justified the reporting of arguments and conclusions, by reference to the doings of other select committees, which had always been accustomed to report facts and conclusions. He was unwilling to rely upon the judgment of the committee, though he had very great confidence in the gentlemen who composed it, and because he could not rely upon the decision of the committee, he was desirous to have the facts all before him, so that he could judge for himself. He thought it necessary, to enable the House to judge of the whole merits of the case, that the report should be printed; and if the examination had been fair, as no one had doubted, the printing would also tend to the advantage of the members implicated.

Mr. RARIDEN said he felt very much at ease in regard to the course the House might think proper to pursue respecting those reports. If they were printed, together with the journal of the committee, and the evidence taken, the report signed by his friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. GRENNELL] and himself, would explain very fully the reasons why they could not join the majority in the report which they felt it their duty to make. If they were not printed, but recommitted to the same committee, with the instructions suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] it would be adopting and carrying out the original views of the minority, as would appear by their report, and so he felt indifferent upon the subject.

Mr. R. said he did not entertain the same views of the power conferred on the committee by the resolution of the House that some others seemed to do. He esteemed the detailing of a select committee to make inquiry, as was done by the resolution of the House in regard to the duel and breach of privilege, as a proceeding touching matters proposed for the future action of the House; that such a step was founded in motives of prudence and economy, and with a due regard to the dignity of the House, and the rights of individuals whose conduct might be investigated, The appointment of such a committee seemed to him an act of caution in the House to guard itself against rashness, and to prevent its time being taken up in necessary preliminary inquiries, in order to satisfy its judgment that it should act definitely upon the subject proposed. This appeared to him to be the object of raising such committees; and it was in every way proper, because the House was less liable to imposition from that quarter than any other; and the members of such committee were not only responsible to the House for the fidelity with which they executed the trust, but responsible also at the bar of public opinion for the action the House might be led to take upon the information communicated to it through such committee.

Entertaining such views of the object of raising this committee, the minority assumed the ground, at an early stage of the investigation, that the committee would fulfil all that was required of it, by reporting to the House the evidence as it received it without comments of their own, with the simple expression of their opinions, that the evidence so taken and reported did or did not prove that the privileges of the House had been invaded in the commission of the acts and circumstances detailed as connected with the death of Jonathan Cilley, without indicating to the House what should be its action thereon, or the measure or character of the punishment proper to be inflicted for such violation. The minority, at least he himself, entertaining those views, did not choose gratuitously to compromit his judgment, especially where he was not required to do so by the House, and he had, therefore, dissented from the majority.

But, said Mr. R. if the journal of the committee, the evidence taken, and the several reports, were printed together, he was content. The journal would show how full and impartial was the examination, and whether of that broad character best calculated to elicit the whole truth or not. It would show especially what questions were propounded to witnesses and overruled by the majority, as irrelevant or impertinent, and it will then be for the House to judge whether answers to the rejected questions might not have reflected some light upon the motives of some of the actors in the scene about which the inquiry was set on foot, and enabled it the better to have adopted a proper and appropriate means of vindicating its rights and punishing the offenders.

Although it may be true that individuals whose acts and conduct connected with the duel were investigated before the committee were personally present, and put questions to witnesses, yet they could not be considered as parties on trial before the committee. It had not the power either to acquit or convict them of a violation of the privileges of the House. It might, by the facts collected and reported, have accused them to the House. But such accusation would not have, nor should it have, any force till adopted by the House as its act, nor could they, before they have been put upon trial. So might the committee have advised the House that no breach of privilege had been committed, and the House might or might not have acquiesced in the advice, as its sense of propriety dictated, but in no point of view could individuals, whose conduct might have been undergoing investigation before this committee be considered a party. The House or the constituency was the only party, and the inquiry delegated to the committee was for such facts as would enable the House to designate whom else, if any one, should be made parties to proceedings to be instituted against them in the House upon the information acquired through the committee.

As to the argumentative report of the majority, professing to receive the evidence taken by the committee, it can be esteemed only as light tendered to the House to lead its mind to the same conclusions with the majority, and certainly no part of the duty required by the House.

As to the publication of the report of the majority in the newspapers, he knew not how it happened. It was not by any direction of the committee that he was ever informed of, and he regretted that, in its published form, it (the report) appeared to be the act of the whole committee, whilst it was well known in the House that it was the act of four of the committee, adverse to the opinions of three, the residue of the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR adverted to the gradual widening of the debate, by members of the committee, by little and little detailing additional occurrences before the committee, while the House was kept in total ignorance of the contents of the document detailing those proceedings. This alone showed the necessity of its being printed. Mr. T. then replied to the objections against the course of the committee, insisting that there was neither usurpation, assumption, nor transcending of power, for the reference of the duelling petitions was an imperative direction to them from the House; the petitions closing, as they nearly all did, with a prayer for the expulsion of the parties implicated. Mr. T. earnestly advocated the motion to print.

Mr. LEGARE said he had come to a conclusion, with which he was satisfied, which he would state to the House, and which he hoped would induce the House to come to a decision of the question. He was for sending back the report to the committee, with instructions to report the facts, without any conclusions or accusations. He considered the subject the most important that had come before the House since he had been a member. It was to settle what had been in a most unsettled state heretofore, the rule by which the House should be governed, in cases where it exercised the most despotic power, uniting the functions of magistrate, jury, and executioner. The House was about to expel a member, to exercise a power analogous to the impeaching power, though that was prohibited to the House, and the result would be to degrade and disfranchise a member of the House, and to declare him unworthy of a seat in that body.

It was because the House was armed with a power so despotic, which might be used for the worst party purposes, and might at all times affect all parties, that he considered this occasion one of tremendous importance and solemnity. He contended for the rule of common sense, and of law, that a party accused shall be confronted with the witnesses; and said that the fundamental principles of liberty in the Constitution, that a man shall be tried by his peers, means also that he shall be heard, and that openly, before the country. After some comment upon various points of the debate, Mr. L. called upon the House to stop, where they now are, and to settle the law of accusation; that it should be made the rule, that a member should be charged with all publicity, and with an accurate specification in form. He hoped the report would be recommitted, and that every thing except a statement of facts would be stricken out.

Mr. ATHERTON replied to some observations of Mr. GRENNELL, and said that if a strict techinal construction of the rule must be maintained, then the moment the committee ascertained that a member was involved, it was their duty to stop, and report that fact; and by such a construction, they had no right to go on and take and report evidence. He went on to comment at length upon the rule which should govern the House, as to be inferred from the cases previously referred to in the debate, and came to the conclusion that the report ought to be printed.

Mr. SLADE then obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment, which did not prevail—yeas 79, nays 83.

Mr. S. then stated that he should vote against the proposition to print, and proceeded to give his reasons, when he gave way to

Mr. CALHOUN of Kentucky who moved an adjournment, and called for tellers, which were ordered.

Mr. LINCOLN asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the question being taken by tellers, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, noes 58.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, April 24, 1838.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of a number of citizens of New York, praying for the establishment of a fiscal agency for the Government, and asking a charter of incorporation: referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL,

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the daughter of Jonas Crane.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which the memorial of the heirs of John de Treville, deceased, had been referred, reported a bill for their relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WHITE presented a communication from the War Department, enclosing a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject of the survey and assignment of lands for emigrating Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the petitions of a number of citizens of Alabama on the subject, reported a bill authorizing the issue of patents to the last bona fide purchase of Indian reservations under the late treaty: read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of Jet Fleming, reported the same without amendment.

The bill to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, Vermont, was taken up and read the third time; and after some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD, PRENTISS and SWIFT, was passed.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial, signed, as he said, by members of every class and condition of society; some of them members of literary institutions, and others merchants, in short, all classes of society, in behalf of the proposed amendment of the international copy right law. The memorialists supposed, Mr. Clay said, that the adoption of the amendment would not only conduce essentially to the interest of American literature, but be an act of justice to foreign countries, by reciprocating, in some measure, the benefits we have received from them. This subject, Mr. C. said, was presented by him to the attention of the Senate at the last session, and since then it had attracted a great deal of the the public attention, several publications having been made respecting it. He had seen several of these publications, and he took the opportunity of saying that every conviction which he entertained of the propriety of this measure at the time he first presented this subject to the Senate, now remained unshaken. The committee to which this subject had been referred, had had it under consideration for some time, and he believed that they had been waiting with very proper motives under a desire that all the parties interested should be fully heard before making their report. But as every thing that could be said or written on the subject had been exhausted, he hoped they would report the result of their deliberations to the Senate at an early day. Mr. C. concluded, by moving the printing of the memorial, and its reference to the Committee on Patents, which was agreed to.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial, numerously signed, on the same subject, which was referred to the same committee; together wito a similar memorial from the professors of the University of Virginia, presented at the last session, and not acted on.

Mr. PRESTON also presented a memorial of a similar character, signed by different classes of persons, booksellers and others. The discussion before the public, Mr. P. said, to which the Senator from Kentucky had alluded, was mainly between authors and publishers, who had supposed themselves to have different interests on this subject, authors being of the opinion that their interests would be subserved by an international copyright law. The discussion had been one of considerable warmth, and had run out somewhat into other collateral matters. Mr. P. believed the Senate had already passed the bill asked for, and, as far as he could ascertain, public opinion was very generally favorable to it, not only in this country, but in all civilized foreign countries. A distinguished member had introduced a bill of this kind in the British Parliament, and had advocated it with much eloquence and ability. In France, also, a measure of the same kind was in progress, and in Germany, where it was of more consequence than any where else, because they were the most extensive makers of books. Mr. P. would be happy to think that the United States had taken the first step on this subject, by proposing a general system for the community of nations, and for the literary class, who exercised a very great control over public sentiment.

And there could not be said to have been a more favorable time for the adoption of this general measure than the present, at the moment when the public mind throughout the world was in a state of repose, was in a state of general sympathy and homogeneousness, and of general union on subjects connected with the happiness and improvement of mankind. This was owing to the great degree of universal peace, prosperity, and happiness, which had existed for the last twenty-five years throughout the civilized world—a degree greater than had existed before since the death of the second Antonine.

This memorial, Mr. P. said, was, to a great extent, from, booksellers and publishers, showing that there was now, on their part, a conformity with the opinions of American authors on this subject. Mr. P. moved that it be printed, and lie on the table: which was ordered.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of a meeting of the Religious Society of Friends lately held in Philadelphia, being delegates from the members of that society in the four States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, upon the subject of Indian affairs generally, and expressing their views, Mr. B. said, in the mild language and benign spirit of Christianity. The memorialists express their regrets at the continuation of the war in Florida, and their hopes that Congress would listen to the appeals made in behalf of the Cherokees. Mr. B. moved that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KING objected to the printing, on the ground that any discussion or agitation of the subject might have an injurious effect. He suggested the propriety of laying it on the table, as was done in the case of a similar memorial presented some time ago. Then the Senate, after some little discussion, and some little reflection, came to the conclusion that it was best to do nothing on the subject.

Mr. BAYARD said this was a memorial from one among the most excellent societies in the United States. It expressed, in general terms, the views of the persons composing the Society, and the great object was, he presumed, merely to place the matter on record. It recommended no measure, said not a word in relation to the Cherokee treaty, and was entirely free from any of the objections made by the gentleman from Alabama. He was desirous, as a matter of respect to the memorialists, that it be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. KING said, as the Senator from Delaware seemed desirous of the reference and printing, he would withdraw all opposition to it. The Senator, however, was mistaken in supposing that it was usual to print memorials of this character. He was well aware of the blameless character of the memorialists, of the mildness and forbearance with which they expressed their views; he respected too the purity of their motives, but in this particular question the printing of their memorial could do no good, and might possibly lead to excitement, as one branch of the subject was already definitively settled, and could not be revived without the greatest danger. He would, however, withdraw his opposition to the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, on the subject of keeping open the river Delaware during the winter; also, recommending that New Castle be made a port of entry; also, asking the establishment of a winter harbor and the construction of piers low down the river Delaware: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. presented the memorial of Walter R. Johnson, praying the establishment of a national institution for the prosecution of experiments and researches in the physical sciences which are required for the public service and for the general welfare of the country: referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to regulate the pay of masters in the navy; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia was taken up, and made the order of the day for Friday next.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Asa Armington; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. TROTTER, the Senate took up the bill supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust claims to land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians. The amendments were agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KING rose to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether they had proceeded in the matter, whether any thing had yet been done, and what was the present state of the business, &c.?

Mr. TROTTER was happy to state, for the information of his friend from Alabama, that they had been very actively engaged to his (Mr. T's) personal knowledge. He had occasion to call at the point where the Commissioners were engaged, and found that they had examined some sixty or seventy cases, and were diligently proceeding with the remainder, which would amount to about twelve hundred. Not more than from three to four cases could be examined a day. The testimony was taken through interpreters, and was noted down by a clerk, which necessarily caused them to proceed but slowly, besides rendering the duty tedious and perplexing. They were progressing with as much rapidity as the nature of the business would admit, and he knew they were extremely solicitous to bring the matter to a close.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. PRESTON, for the re-annexation of Texas to the United States, was taken up as the order of the day; when,

Mr. PRESTON rose and addressed the Senate until past three o'clock on the subject of his resolution. He spoke of Texas as a young and vigorous Republic, that had risen like an exhalation from the earth, and destined, at no very distant day, to be a grand and glorious empire. Mr. P. glanced at the relative condition of Mexico and Texas; the one almost a wild and unproductive waste, while the other, though but of yesterday, in matters of legislation, of jurisprudence, commercial knowledge, and agricultural science, was far, very far, in advance. And were we to forego the mighty advantage that was offered us by the annexation of this great country, from the idle dread, and wretched scruples which our Northern brethren seemed to entertain, lest it would be the means of spreading negro slavery? Mr. P. contended, that if Texas remained to herself, slavery might be extended; but if she were annexed to us, the condition of the slave would be improved, while there would be no addition to the number. [As soon as the reporter can prepare from his notes this eloquent and forcible speech, it will be presented to the public.]

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; and when the doors were opened,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1838.

REPORT OF THE DUELLING COMMITTEE.

The House resumed the unfinished business, being the report of the committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, late a member of the House, the question being on the motion of Mr. TOUCEY, under the unanimous direction of the committee, to print and postpone it till Monday week.

Mr. SLADE continued his remarks in opposition to the printing of the report, testimony, &c. mainly on the ground that it should be first ascertained whether the committee had not transcended their powers. He denied that the objection was a technical one. It was a substantial one, consistent with common sense, and founded on the nature of things. On this point Mr. S. dwelt at considerable length, illustrating it by referring to the course of committees upon other questions, which was always confined within certain rules. In this instance the committee had nothing to do with trying the individuals implicated, or making an argument to prove they were guilty, but merely, as grand jurors, to return if there was sufficient cause to put them upon their trial. The only report they were empowered to make was that Mr. CILLEY was killed by Mr. GRAVES in a duel; but they should neither have pronounced a verdict of guilty, have recommended a punishment, nor have made an argument to enforce the necessity of the verdict and punishment. Hence he was opposed to the printing of this document, was in favor of its being recommitted, and should then be unwilling to postpone it. At present, if it was sent to the people, it would be promulgating an ex parte statement.

Mr. TOUCEY again protested against this assertion, for, so far from the testimony being ex parte, every opportunity was afforded to all the individuals, interested in the examination, to cross examine witnesses, and bring others of their own.

Mr. SLADE explained, that he referred to the report as being ex parte, for the people in the fervor of their feelings, would take it up and make up their minds upon it; and hence, if the House should, at the end of the fortnight's postponement, come to a different decision, there would be a conflict of opinion between them and their constituents.

Mr. S. in reply to the argument that the petitions partook of the nature of instructions, admitted that, though general petitions did, this was not an analogous case, because it affected the private rights of individual members of the House.

Mr. FOSTER contended that it was not proper for the committee to present a mere report of evidence in a crude, undigested form. They were instructed to investigate the facts, and "report thereon;" and it was their duty to examine the evidence, and present it in intelligible order, with such remarks as might lead the House to an intelligible decision. He thought the committee had kept strictly within the line of their duty. If he supposed any injustice was done by the committee to the persons implicated, he would not vote for the printing. The question was, whether the report should be printed—not how it came there. He was disposed to do all justice, and would be the last man to shield a member by mere technicality, such as the cobweb technicalities that prevail in courts of law. He could not consent to establish technical rules to ride over rules of justice. He went at length into the principles of trials in courts of justice, and by impeachment. The rights of the House to expel a member, when two-thirds of the members thought it proper, was not derived from the usages of the British Parliament, nor like those usages, from prescription, but arose under the Constitution; and it was necessary and proper to institute free and full examinations, and not for the members to shield themselves under abstruse technicalities, so as to avoid those responsibilities to which other individuals are liable, from the action of the House. He also referred to the various petitions, praying for investigation, and some of them praying for the expulsion of certain members by name, all which were referred to the committee, as a sufficient reason for a full and general report. Such a report alone would satisfy the people; and if the committee had stopped short, and merely had reported the evidence, there would have been just cause of complaint, and he would have been in favor of sending the report back, for the committee to complete their duty, as other committees are required to do. In the case of John Smith in the Senate, the committee reported the evidence, with a report and resolution, and that resolution was the foundation of all the subsequent action of the Senate. The report and resolution were received then, and by the same rule should be received now. He looked upon this as a mere preliminary proceeding, and the House had the right and power, in their future action, to correct any errors the committee may have made, and to receive any additional testimony, to enable them to arrive at a just conclusion. There was no danger, he argued, of members being treated with injustice by the House; their friendly relations and daily social intercourse would forbid it. Mr. F. repelled the intimation that any members desired to circulate the report to injure the standing of any member, or to influence his re-election in case he should be expelled. He thought no member could be actuated by such unworthy motives. He did not fear excitement in the public mind: if there was excitement two month ago, it had been allayed; and the inevitable consequence of any excitement which might lead to injustice to any individual for a time, was a reaction which would more than atone for the momentary injury. There was no fear of permanent injustice to any man; and the people wanted, and had a right to have, all the evidence upon which the House was called upon to act. The question he considered to be, not whether the committee had conformed to technical forms, but whether they had done injustice; and he hoped the report would be printed, that the House might be enabled to judge of the facts and the arguments, which they could not do as long as it remained in manuscript. He construed the intention of the rule of the Manual to be simply to prevent a member being tried, and perhaps degraded, by the report of a committee in secret session, without his having any knowledge of it. This was, in no sense, such a case; and the rule could not operate.

Mr. FLETCHER of Massachusetts said he felt no scruples upon the particular point of the printing; but he felt some solicitude to know, if the report should be postponed for a fortnight, what would be the condition in which it would then come up, and in what condition some matters in relation to it would be found. With a view to understanding some of these points upon which he felt solicitous to have information, he desired to ask some questions of the chairman of the committee, and he would propound them separately.

He would first ask the chairman whether the testimony of the individuals affected by the report, or of any of them, had been taken?

Mr. TOUCEY stated, in reply, that the testimony of Mr. GRAVES was taken upon the application of Mr. WISE, as alleged, for his special benefit; the testimony of Mr. WISE was taken at his own request, and at his own solicitation; the testimony of Mr. JONES was taken without the solicitation of any one, but was his own voluntary offer.

Mr. WISE wished the chairman to repeat that statement.

Mr. TOUCEY did so.

Mr. WISE wished the chairman also to state the fact that the request was not made until after the writen testimony of Mr. GRAVES had been returned by the committee.

Mr. TOUCEY stated that the general interrogatory, put to witnesses, was furnished to Mr. GRAVES, accompanied with a proffer that his testimony, his own statement, would be received by the committee. Mr. GRAVES addressed a letter to the committee, accompanying his statement, in which he expressed himself as wishing it to be understood that the committee had interrogated him, and called upon him, to make a statement. The committee thereupon returned his testimony to him, and adopted a resolution, declaring that it was not the intention of the committee to put him under any obligations to answer, but simply to give him an opportunity, if he chose to avail himself of it. It was subsequent to this that a letter was addressed to the committee by Mr. WISE requesting that his statement might be taken, as necessary to his defence. That letter was laid before the committee was read, and upon it he presented his statement.

Mr. WISE would ask the chairman whether a different notification was not written to Messrs. GRAVES, WISE, and JONES, than was written to the other witnesses in the form of summons? Whether, without the examination of any testimony, and before any testimony was gone into, it was not taken for granted by the committee that these persons were to be implicated?

Mr. TOUCEY could answer that inquiry. The committee, in the first place, called upon Mr. GRAVES, Mr. WISE, and Mr. JONES, for the correspondence, which was presented by the committee. It appearing, in that correspondence, that Mr. GRAVES was interested, and that the other gentlemen acted as seconds in the duel, a resolution was then offered that the interrogatory which was put to all the witnesses should be put into their hands, and that, if they chose, the committee would receive a statement from them. This might not be the strict phraseology, but it was the substance.

Mr. WISE. But there was a difference in the notification to them from that sent to the other witnesses.

Mr TOUCEY had stated the fact as he understood it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the chairman allow me to ask if the testimony of those individuals was taken under oath?

Mr. TOUCEY. It was taken under oath, and all the witnesses were cross-examined.

At this stage Mr. TAYLOR rose, and drew the attention of the CHAIR to the irregularity of this proceeding, and the CHAIR ruled it out.

Mr. TOUCEY expressed a hope that he might be permitted to make a full statement in reply to Mr FLETCHER's inquiry, and begged that no one would object to it.

Mr. THOMAS should object, for the obvious reason of its irregularity. He understood these interrogatories were propounded in order to obtain from the chairman statements of what occurred in the committee room. Now it must be foreseen that this would be wholly improper.

The CHAIR stated the ground taken by him in the early part of this proceeding. It was, to exclude all statements of what occurred in the committee room, and he had attempted to rule the House down to that point. In the progress of the debate, however, although in almost every hour he had interposed, in as mild and proper a manner as he could, by suggesting to gentlemen that they were exceeding the proper limits, the debate had gradually slided beyond that point, though, to this moment, what had been referred to had been spoken of suppositiously, or for the sake of argument and illustration. When the gentleman from Massachusetts rose and propounded his interrogatory, the Chair did not, at the instant, perceive its exact bearing, but he saw enough now, however, to make it very clear that the course of the interrogatories was extending the debate too far, for statements of what occurred in the committee room, or any transactions there, were entirely irregular.

Mr. TOUCEY desired to state a fact in explanation.

The CHAIR could not suffer this debate to go on, but the House might, by its unanimous consent. It was objected to, however, by several gentlemen.

Mr. GRAVES expressed a hope that the range of debate would not be restricted, as he desired an opportunity of addressing the House on the merits of the question. As it would have to be opened, he trusted it would be opened at once.

Mr. FLETCHER resumed, and went on to say that he understood that there had been an adjudication, and that sentence had in effect been pronounced.

Mr. TOUCEY rose to explain.

Mr. FLETCHER said he had seen in a public print a decision, as a part of the report, that certain members had offended, and should be subjected to certain punishments, and that he took to be an adjudication.

Mr. TOUCEY was about to explain the action of the committee, when

The SPEAKER interposed, and said the report must speak for itself.

Mr. FLETCHER resumed, and said that as to the question of printing, he had nothing to say. But he wanted to know, when the subject should come up finally for the action of the House, how he was to stand in relation to the report. He wanted to know if the members had been put on trial and if they had been heard in their defence. If the House was to be called upon, when the report should come up on the postponement, to act upon the resolution, as it now stands, it would lead to inextricable confusion. They would be called upon to decide, without a trial, without a hearing, and without the proper preliminary steps, whether certain members of the House deserved punishment.

Mr. BOON rose to order: he wished to know, if upon the question of printing and postponement, it was in order to discuss the punishment. Or how any member could know what was in the report.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to discuss the question of punishment.

Mr TOUCEY said the first question was, whether any member had been guilty of a breach of privilege?

Mr. FLETCHER said, No: it was a question whether a member should be punished. Was it proposed that any member should be put on trial?

Mr. TOUCEY. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER said if the report recommended a trial he would go for it, but he did not understand that there was any such proposition. As he understood the report as it now stands, there was a resolution of punishment, but no proposition for the trial of any member of the House. It was for punishment without trial; and if the House was to take up the report hereafter, to act first upon that resolution, it would be involved in unavoidable and inextricable confusion. He wished that the report might be so altered now, that the action of the House could be practicable; whereas, as the report now stands it must be wholly impracticable. He desired to have such a course taken with the report now as would lead to a result directly, without postponement. There was such a course, clear and definite; and he referred to the case of John Smith as a precedent. There the committee took testimony, and reported it to the Senate, when the accused was put upon trial before that body de novo. That was the course that should be adopted now. But as the report now stands, he could see no course for the action of the House. It would be a mere question of punishment, without trial, without hearing, without defence, on the part of the accused. He wished the House would now put the report in some shape, so that the House could obtain the evidence, and come to a practicable action upon it, without a repetition of this debate on a matter of form.

Mr. GRANTLAND remarked, that the committee had received a great deal of censure, if not abuse, for the manner in which they had conducted their proceedings, and, strange to say, from quarters too who had voted for the resolution. The objection had been based on the rule laid down by Mr. Jefferson. Now was that rule known when the resolution was adopted? If so, why did not those cognizant of it call the attention of the House to it, and have the course of the committee directed under it? Why did not the learned gentleman from Massachusetts, who, above all others, had censured the committee, direct the proper course of the committee by amending the resolution? All Mr. G. could say was, that the committee had discharged the duty assigned to them to the best of their ability. Several of them were new members, and but few of them were versed in the rules of parliamentary law. If, however, any member of the House knew of that rule, and did not notify the House of it, but censured the committee, Mr. G. should say that that member was far more deserving of censure than the committee, or any member of it.

The committee had also been censured on another account, and he believed no gentleman who had participated in this debate had said one word in extenuation of them. They had been censured for moving a postponement of this subject to so distant a day, and he had hoped that when the gentleman from Massachusetts, who was a member of the committee, [Mr. GRENNELL,] occupied the House for a considerable length of time, he would have explained to the House why so distant a day had been named, because it was done for the particular convenience of the gentleman himself! The balance of the committee proposed a much earlier day—as early a day as could be named after the papers were printed, but that gentleman informed the committee that he wished to be absent from the city, and—

The CHAIR requested the gentleman to abstain from going into any proceedings before the committee.

Mr. GRANTLAND explained that several gentlemen had severely censured the committee, and he could not justify them without referring to what had been done there in relation to the point upon which they were threatened.

Mr. GRENNELL rose to explain.

Mr. GRANTLAND assured the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he did not advert to this, to censure the gentleman, but to repel the attack made upon the committee.

Mr. GRENNELL said that one week from Monday—

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that if any thing which occurred in the committee might be stated, every thing might.

Mr. GRENNELL would merely explain, then, that he made no request, but stated the fact to the committee that he was going to be absent.

Mr. GRANTLAND, in reply, said he would appeal to every member of the committee if it was not at the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the motion for so distant a day was adopted?

In reference to the other point, however, he must say, that if blame was attachable any where, the House, and not the committee, was to blame. The committee had reported, which was what they were directed to do, and had made three reports, or one report and two counter reports; and he should suppose one of them might please, or if neither did, the House might amend one of them. But the committee were ordered to make a report, and having done so, they were now told they had no right to make a report; and this, too, by those who had voted for that very order! Why did they not say so at the time?

It seems that the committee did not think of a rule of which nobody else thought; for, if any one had known of it, he would have acted with candor to have drawn the attention of the House to it. But they had other instructions than those embraced in the resolution. He held in his hand two out of some hundred or more petitions, signed by some twenty odd thousand people, perhaps, praying for the expulsion of members of the House, by name. These two petitions were presented by the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who had reflected so severely upon the committee, and Mr. G. would ask for what purpose they were sent to the committee, if their prayer was not to be acted upon? Why not lay them upon the table? Now the committee did consider that a strong indication of the will and intention of the House, and how could they view it in any other light? He repeated, that great injustice had been done to the committee, but it was no unusual thing to do injustice to an investigating committee, for those who disliked the object of the investigation generally attacked the committee, and tried to divert the object.

For himself, Mr. G. said, he cared very little what course was taken. He went into the committee perfectly unprejudiced, and he could assure the House that if any gentleman had brought the clause in the Manual to his notice, he certainly would have given to it his serious attention; but he had never heard of it, and he doubted if ten members of the House had had any knowledge of it. All knew that there was nothing about which they differed so much as the rules of the House; but this was not known, he believed, to one, certainly not to ten members of the House, at the time the resolution was passed. Had Mr. G. known it, he might have given a different direction to the course he pursued.

Mr. BELL went at length into an argument to show, that the parties accused had a right to a full trial before the House, if they chose to claim it; though he supposed the individuals in this case would not insist upon the extent of their rights in that respect. He also made some remarks to show that it was improper to print the evidence, as much so as to print the arguments of the committee. But he was authorized to say, that the parties implicated desired that the evidence might be laid at once, without delay, before the House and the country. Be it favorable or unfavorable, they desired that the proofs might be laid immediately before the community. But he considered that this would be a precedent, and that no departure from the strictest course of such a proceeding should be allowed, unless by general consent of the House, and the parties, and with that fact entered upon the journal. This he contended was necessary, in order to guard the rights of members who may be accused hereafter, perhaps in times of high party excitement, when political, personal, and vindictive passions might be urged on to procure the ruin of a member of the House.

Mr. PENNYBACKER said he did not rise to make a speech. He wished to make a suggestion in relation to a remark that the vote would be of a party cast. He deprecated such a result. He hoped the motion to postpone and print would not prevail; and he was emboldened to maintain that opinion by the assertion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that the parties had no objection to let the House have the full testimony in the case. He thought the committee had acted in good faith, though he believed they had gone a little further than the law would warrant. He was not here when the original resolution was passed; but if he had been here he should have voted for it, and should act now precisely as if he had done so. Mr. P. referred to cases reported of trials in the British House of Commons; and inferred the necessity of a notice to the House, when it is ascertained that a member is implicated, that the House may take such steps as they may deem proper; and that the member may ask leave to appear before the committee. Such, as he read, is the uniform practice of the British Parliament. He knew that it was said that the House had in their mind's eye certain members of the House, in the passage of the original resolution. But this was a judicial proceeding; and it did not judicially appear that any such persons were indicated or implicated. The recollection of the members of ther House, who may now understand the whole supposed case, would pass away, and nothing would remain upon the journal to show to those who may come hereafter, that any members were implicated. As the House was acting, not merely for the present, but setting a precedent for the government of the future, he hoped the proceedings would be corrected, and that some such resolutions as had been indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] might be adopted.

Mr. SERGEANT suggested to the SPEAKER and to the House, but particularly to the SPEAKER, the necessity of conforming strictly to the law; because it was no justification of a known wrong, that it had been committed in conformity to an order of the House, which in itself was contrary to law. He also looked to the result, if, in case the proceedings should be irregular, the House should pass resolutions of expulsion and censure, and the members should resist the execution of the sentence. The House was bound to follow the constitutional provisions made for the preservation of private rights and personal privileges. The party accused has a right to be openly charged, and heard in his defence in open trial.

He went at length into an examination of the doings of the committee, to show that the law had not been conformed to in the proceedings of the committee, so as to secure to the members implicated those rights and privileges, of which the House had no power to deprive them. He would go so far as to say, that a member accused had no right to waive any privilege to which by law he is entitled, because all the privileges of the law are the property and privileges of every member of the House and of their constituents; and it was important that in all cases they should be carefully maintained and held sacred.

Mr. BOON called for the reading of the report. He wished to know upon what he was called upon to vote.

Mr. BELL objected to the proceeding as a violation of the proper course.

The SPEAKER decided that the question had been settled four years ago; that no member could be called upon to vote upon a paper which had not been read.

The CLERK having been directed to proceed, read as follows:

The Committee appointed to investgate the causes which led to the death of the Hon. Jonathan Cilley, late a member of the House of Representatives, and the circumstances connected therewith, and to inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of the House, and to whom were referred sundry memorials upon the subject, now ask leave to submit their

REPORT:

In discharging the trust committed to them by the House of Representatives, the committee have endeavored implicitly to obey its order, neither stopping short, on the one hand, of the full measure of the duty imposed upon them, nor transcending its just limits on the other. They were of the opinion that the investigation was instituted solely for the maintenance of the privileges of the House. It was not within the province of the House of Representatives to investigate the causes which led to the death of one of its members, or the circumstances which attended it, with a view to the punishment of any offender for a high crime or misdemeanor. That belongs, in every case, exclusively to the courts of law. Senators and Representatives are not privileged from arrest in cases of "treason, felony, and breach of the peace;" and it is a constitutional provision, that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted by the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence." The inquiry, therefore, is directed to one object only—the maintenance of the privileges of the House; and the question is, what, in that view, were the causes which led to the death of Mr. Cilley, and the circumstances connected therewith, and did they involve a breach of those privileges?

In pursuing this investigation, the committee have examined all whose testimony, there was reason to believe, might be material; and Messrs. Graves, Wise, and Jones, members of the House, were permitted to attend, and to examine and cross-examine the witnesses; and the same leave was extended to Mr. Menefee, of the House, and to Mr. Pierce, of the Senate, at their request. The entire mass of the testimony is now submitted as a part of this report. One witness, Daniel Jackson, of the city of New York, who was summoned to attend, and called upon to testify, has neglected to obey the requisition, though he appeared before the committee, and interrogatories were put to him; but, from the position in which he stood, and the disclosures of another witness, it was not thought worth the time or attention of the House or of the committee to notice him further.

The late Jonathan Cilley, a member of the House from the State of Maine, fell by the hand of William J. Graves, a member of the House from the State of Kentucky, in a duel fought with rifles, near the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland, on Saturday, the 24th of February last.

The causes which led to his death are intimately connected with the proceedings of this House. On the 12th of February Mr. Wise, of Virginia, presented to the House a publication in the New York Courier and Enquirer, charging a member of Congress with corruption upon the authority of an anonymous writer under the signature of "the Spy in Washington;" and thereupon moved a resolution for the appointment of a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire into the charge. Mr. Wise said: "The character of the authority upon which the charge is made, is vouched for as respectable and authentic by the editor of the Courier and Enquirer, in whose paper it appears, and the House is called upon to defend its honor and dignity against the charge."

Mr. Cilley addressed the House in opposition to the resolution. In the course of the debate he said "he said he knew nothing of this editor; but if it was the same editor who had once made grave charges against an institution of this country, and afterwards was said to have received facilities to the amount of some $52,000 from the same institution, and gave it his hearty support, he did not think his charges were entitled to much credit in an American Congress." These words, spoken by Mr. Cilley in debate, were strictly in order, were pertinent to the subject under discussion, and "did not exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty;" and though they implied a doubt inconsistent with unblemished honor and character in the person alluded to, yet Mr. Cilley was justified in the use of them, by a report of a committee of the House of Representatives, appointed on the 14th of March, 1832, to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States. An extract from the report, made by the majority of the committee, and published by order of the House of Representatives, is hereunto annexed, in which it is stated, that "for sixteen months" the New York Courier and Enquirer "was warmly opposed" to the Bank of the United States; that on the 26th of March, 1831, and within less than nine months thereafter, the bank made three loans, amounting "to the sum of $52,975, which consisted of notes drawn and endorsed by the editors only;" and that "on or about the 8th of April, 1831, it (the paper) changed its course in favor of the bank."

It was in reference to the facts contained in this report, and published to the world by order of the House of Representatives, that Mr. Cilley spoke the words, which had been already recited; and for thus alluding to facts put forth in the published documents of the body of which he was a member, he was called in question by the editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer. James Watson Webb, on the 21st of February last, addressed a note to him, reciting those words, apprizing him that the writer of it was the editor of that paper, and concluding with a demand of explanation, couched in very explicit terms.

GADSBY'S HOTEL,
Washington, February 21, 1838.

SIR: In the Washington Globe of the 12th instant, you are reported to have said, in the course of the debate which took place in the House of Representatives on that day, growing out of a publication made in the New York Courier and Enquirer—"He (you) knew nothing of this editor; but if it was the same editor who had once made grave charges against an institution of this country, and afterwards was said to have received facilities to the amount of some $52,000 from the same institution, and gave it his hearty support, he did not think his charges were entitled to much credit in an American Congress."

I deem it my duty to apprize you, sir, that I am the editor of the paper in which the letter from the "Spy in Washington," charging a member of Congress with corruption, was first published; and the object of this communication is to inquire of you whether I am the editor to whom you alluded, and, if so, to ask the explanation which the character of your remarks renders necessary.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. WATSON WEBB.

To the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY.

This demand of explanation, under the circumstances which existed, was not susceptible of misinterpretation, and, the sequel proves, was not misunderstood. Mr. Graves was the bearer of this note, having read it, and being fully apprized of its contents, and tendered it to Mr. Cilley, in the hall of the House of Representatives, while the House was in session. Mr. Cilley declined to receive it, and thereupon a brief correspondence ensued, which terminated in the challenge and death of Mr. Cilley by the bearer of this note. The first note of Mr. Graves was delivered by himself to Mr. Cilley, on the same day on which he bore the note of Webb, that is, on Wednesday, the 21st of February, 1838, and should have borne that date. It is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 20, 1838.

In the interview which I had with you this morning, when you declined receiving from me the note of Colonel J. W. Webb, asking whether you were correctly reported in the Globe in what you are there represented to have said of him in this House, on the 12th instant, you will please say whether you did not remark, in substance, that in declining to receive the note, you hoped I would not consider it, in any respect, disrespectful to me; and that the ground on which you rested your declining to receive the note was distinctly this: That you could not consent to get yourself into personal difficulties with conductors of public journals, for what you might think proper to say in debate upon this floor, in discharge of your duties as a representative of the people; and that you did not rest your objection, in our interview, upon any personal objections to Colonel Webb as a gentleman.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
W. J. GRAVES.

Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY.

It will be observed that the note which Mr. Graves bore, is described by him as the note of Colonel J. W. Webb, asking whether Mr. Cilley was correctly reported in the Globe, in what he was there represented to have said in the House of Representatives, on the 12th instant. But it will be perceived that the note itself, though it is thus described by Mr. Graves whenever he speaks of it afterwards, does not contain that inquiry.

Mr. Cilley, on the same day, personally delivered to Mr. Graves the following note in reply:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 21, 1838.

The note which you just placed in my hands has been received. In reply, I have to state that in your interview with me this morning, when you proposed to deliver a communication from Colonel Webb, of the New York Courier and Enquirer, I declined to receive it, because I chose to be drawn into no controversy with him. I neither affirmed or denied any thing in regard to his character; but when you remarked that this course on my part might place you in an unpleasant situation, I stated to you, and now repeat, that I intended, by the refusal, no disrespect to you.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JONA. CILLEY.

Hon. W. J. GRAVES.

On Thursday, the day following, Mr. Graves sent his second note to Mr. Cilley, which was delivered to him in his seat, during the session of the House, by Mr. Menefee, of Kentucky, the latter accompanying its delivery with an expression of the hope that Mr. Cilley would perceive the propriety of relieving Mr. Graves from a position which was painful to him. Mr. Cilley remarked that the note should be attended to. It is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 22, 1838.

SIR: Your note of yesterday, in reply to mine of that date, is inexplicit, unsatisfactory, and insufficient. Among other things in this, that, in your declining to receive Colonel Webb's communication, it does not disclaim any exception to him personally as a gentleman. I have, therefore, to inquire whether you declined to receive his communication on the ground of any personal exception to him as a gentleman or a man of honor? A categorical answer is expected.

Very respectfully,
WM. J. GRAVES.

Hon. J. CILLEY.

Mr. Cilley, on the same day, returned the following reply, by Mr. Duncan, of Ohio:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 22, 1838.

SIR: Your note of this date has just been placed in my hands. I regret that mine of yesterday was unsatisfactory to you; but I cannot admit the right on your part to propound the question to which you ask a categorical answer, and therefore decline any further response to it.

Very respectfully,
Hon. W. GRAVES. JONA. CILLEY.

On Friday, the 23d of February, Mr. Wise presented to Mr. Cilley, at his boarding house, a few minutes before 12 o'clock, m. a challenge from Mr. Graves.

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 23, 1838.

As you have declined accepting a communication which I bore to you from Colonel Webb, and as by your note of yesterday you have refused to decline on grounds which would exonerate me from all responsibility growing out of the affair, I am left no other alternative but to ask that satisfaction which is recognised among gentlemen. My friend, Hon. Henry A. Wise, is authorized by me to make the arrangements suitable to the occasion.

Your obedient servant,

WM. J. GRAVES.

Hon. J. CILLEY.

On the evening of the same day, about the hour of 5 o'clock, p. m. Mr. Jones, the delegate from Wisconsin, delivered to Mr. Graves, in the room of Mr. Wise, and in his presence, an acceptance of the challenge:

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 23, 1838.

Your note of this morning has been received. My friend, Gen. Jones, will "make the arrangements suitable to the occasion."

Your obedient servant,

JONA. CILLEY.

Hon. W. J. GRAVES.

Mr. Jones immediately submitted the following propositions to Mr. Wise:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1838.

SIR: Mr. Cilley proposes to meet Mr. Graves, at such place as may be agreed upon between us, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, m. The weapons to be used on the occasion shall be rifles; the parties placed side to side at 80 yards distance from each other; to hold the rifles horizontally at arm's length, downwards; the rifles to be cocked, and triggers set; the words to be, "Gentlemen, are you ready?" After which, neither answering "No," the words shall be, in regular succession, "Fire—one, two, three, four." Neither party shall fire before the word "fire," nor after the word "four." The positions of the parties at the ends of the line to be determined by lot. The second of the party losing the position shall have the giving of the word. The dress to be ordinary winter clothing, and subject to the examination of both parties. Each party may have on the ground, besides his second, a surgeon, and two other friends. The seconds, for execution of their respective trusts, are allowed to have a pair of pistols each on the ground, but no other person shall have any weapon. The rifles to be loaded in the presence of the seconds. Should Mr. Graves not be able to procure a rifle by the time prescribed, time shall be allowed for that purpose.

Your very obedient servant,

GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. HENRY A. WISE.

About 9 o'clock, p. m. Mr. Wise replied:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1838.

SIR: The terms arranging the meeting between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley, which you presented to me this evening, though unusual and objectionable, are accepted; with the understanding that the rifles are to be loaded with a single ball, and that neither party is to raise his weapon from the downward horizontal position until the word "fire."

I will inform you, sir, by the hour of 11 o'clock, a. m. to-morrow, whether Mr. Graves has been able to procure a rifle, and, consequently, whether he will require a postponement of the time of meeting.

Your very obedient servant,

HENRY A. WISE.

Hon. GEO. W. JONES.

About 8 o'clock, a. m. on the 24th, Mr. Jones left at Mr. Wise's room the following note, to wit:

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C.
February 24, 1838.

SIR: I will receive, at Doctor Reilly's, on F street, any communication you may see proper to make me, until 11 o'clock, a. m. to-day.

Respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. WISE.

DR. REILLY'S, F STREET,
February 24, 1838, 10 o'clock, a. m.

SIR: I have called at this place, in conformity with your note of this morning, to inform you that Mr. Graves has not as yet been able to procure a rifle and put it in order, and cannot be ready by 12 o'clock, m. to-day. He is desirous, however, to have the meeting to-day, if possible, and I will inform you by half-past 12 o'clock, m. to-day, what time to procure and prepare a weapon he will require.

Very respectfully, &c.

HENRY A. WISE.

Hon. GEORGE W. JONES.

WASHINGTON, 10½, a. m.
February 24, 1838.

Your note, dated at 10 o'clock to-day, is received.

In reply, I have the pleasure to inform you that I have in my possession an excellent rifle, in good order, which is at the service of Mr. Graves.

Very respectfully, &c.

GEORGE W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. WISE.

Afterwards, Mr. Jones sent to Mr. Wise's room the following note, to wit:

WASHINGTON,
February 24, 1838, 11, a. m.

SIR: Through the politeness of my friend, Doctor Duncan, I now tender to you, for the use of Mr. Graves, the rifle referred to in my note of 10½, a. m. this morning.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. WISE.

And with this note a rifle and powder-flask, and balls, were left at Mr. Wise's room.

The rifle was procured by Mr. Jones, and sent by him to Mr. Wise, in accordance with a previous request of Mr. Wise, or in consequence of a conversation between them. Mr. Jones says it was in strict accordance with the request of Mr. Wise: and Mr. Wise says he had a conversation with Mr. Jones upon the subject, requested Mr. Jones to inform him where one could be obtained, and has no doubt that it was in consequence of this conversation that Mr. Jones sent the rifle, and that he acted with the best motive in sending it.

Mr. Wise having received the last note, called on Mr. Jones, and informed him that Mr. Graves had procured another rifle, and would be ready for the meeting at 3 o'clock, p. m. The parties met by arrangement on the road to Marlborough, in Maryland. Mr. Cilley was accompanied by his second, Mr. Jones, by Mr. Bynum of North Carolina, and Col. James W. Schaumburg, as his friends, and by Dr. Duncan of Ohio, as his surgeon. Mr. Graves was attended by Mr. Wise, as his second, by Mr. Crittenden, Senator from Kentucky, and Mr. Menefee of Kentucky, as his friends, and by Dr. Foltz, of this city, as his surgeon; and all procedded thence about 2 o'clock, p. m. to the place of meeting. Mr. Jones and Mr. Wise immediately marked off the ground. The line of fire was at right angles with the rays of the sun. The choice of positions fell by lot to Mr. Wise, and Mr. Jones had the giving of the word. Mr. Wise chose the position at the northwesterly end of the line. The distance was about ninety-two yards. There was a strong wind falling on the line of fire at an angle of about 45° against Mr. Cilley. The position of Mr. Graves was near a wood, partly sheltered by it, and that of Mr. Cilley was on higher ground, and in the open field. The calibre of Mr. Graves's rifle was nearly twice as large as that of Mr. Cilley's, and would receive a ball of about eighty to the pound; while the rifle of Mr. Cilley would receive a ball of about one hundred and thirty-two to the pound. Mr. Calhoon and Mr. Hawes, both members of the House from Kentucky, were at some distance off as spectators. Mr. Wise had two rifles on the ground, one of which, not being loaded, remained, by consent, in one of the carriages. The hack drivers were on the ground; and two other persons, (Grafton Powell and James F. Brown,) were present, without the consent of either party or their friends.

Shortly after 3 o'clock, p. m. the parties exchanged shots, according to the terms of meeting. Mr. Cilley fired first, before he had fully elevated his piece; and Mr. Graves fired one or two seconds afterwards. Both missed. Mr. Graves could not have reserved his fire, had he been disposed to do so.

The friends assembled at the request of Mr. Wise, and Mr. Jones inquired of Mr. Wise whether his friend [Mr. Graves] was satisfied? Mr. Wise immediately said: "Mr. Jones, these gentlemen have come here without animosity towards each other; they are fighting merely upon a point of honor; cannot Mr. Cilley assign some reason for not receiving at Mr. Graves's hands Col. Webb's communication, or make some disclaimer which will relieve Mr. Graves from his position?" Mr. Jones replied: "While the challenge is impending, Mr. Cilley can make no explanations." Mr. Wise said: "The exchange of shots suspends the challenge, and the challenge is suspended for explanation." Mr. Jones, thereupon, went to Mr. Cilley and returned; and after a few words in regard to putting in writing what had been and might be said, Mr. Jones proceeded to say: "I am authorized by my friend, Mr. Cilley, to say, that in declining to receive the note from Mr. Graves, purporting to be from Colonel Webb, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, because he entertained for him then, as he now does, the highest respect and the most kind feelings; but that he declined to receive the note, because he chose not to be drawn into any controversy with Colonel Webb," or, "he refuses to disclaim disrespect for Colonel Webb, because he does not choose to be drawn into an expression of opinion as to him." Both expressions were used in the course of the conversation. After a consultation on each side, Mr. Wise said to Mr. Jones, "This answer leaves Mr. Graves precisely in the position in which he stood when the challenge was sent." From an examination of the evidence, it will be perceived that, although the language made use of by the persons present, in narrating what passed on this occasion, is not the same, there is yet no substantial difference between them. Mr. Cilley re-asserted the ground which he had assumed in the correspondence; that he declined to receive the note of Webb, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with him; that he refused to disclaim any personal exception to Webb as a gentleman or man of honor, because he would neither affirm nor deny any thing in regard to his character; and that in declining to receive the demand of explanation, he had intended no disrespect to Mr. Graves. Mr. Cilley even went farther, and declared that he entertained for him the highest respect and the most kind feelings. The position of Graves was, therefore, not changed, except so far as the peril of life by Mr. Cilley in defence of his own position, and the subsequent voluntary avowal of the highest respect and the most kind feelings for the individual who had put him in jeopardy, may be supposed to have changed it.

Mr. Crittenden says, that it was now "urged on the part of Mr. Graves that Mr. Cilley ought to make some such explanation or declaration as had been proposed, for the satisfaction of Mr. Graves; while on the part of Mr. Cilley it was urged that Mr. Graves ought to be satisfied with the exchange of shots, without any such explanation or declaration." All the friends of Mr. Cilley urged that Mr. Graves should now be satisfied, and that the affair should now terminate, without requiring from Mr. Cilley any further concession beyond what he had already made. Doctor Foltz said he "thought the affair should end here; that there was no personal ill feelings between the parties; that they had both proved themselves men of honor and courage; and that Mr. Cilley's opinion of Colonel Webb could not be changed by the further exchange of shots or the receipt of wounds." Mr. Crittenden was understood, by nearly all present, to concur in these views, though it seems he did not intend so to be understood, but acquiesced with Mr. Wise and Mr. Menefee in insisting that the fight should go on, unless Mr. Cilley would make the concession which had been demanded. Accordingly the challenge was renewed, the parties resumed their positions, and again exchanged shots in the manner prescribed by the terms of meeting. Mr. Graves fired first, before he had fully elevated his piece; Mr. Cilley fired about two seconds afterwards. They both missed. Mr. Cilley could not have reserved his fire had he been disposed to do so. Mr. Jones, Mr. Bynum, Mr. Schaumburg, Doctor Foltz, Mr. Wise, and Mr. Fuller, thought, from the motions and appearance of Mr. Graves, that he was hit. He at once said, "I must have another shot." Mr. Wise says, "he positively, peremptorily, and repeatedly insisted upon another shot."

The seconds and friends again assembled, and the challenge was again withdrawn. Mr. Jones said, "Mr. Wise, my friend, in coming to the ground and exchanging shots with Mr. Graves, has shown to the world that, in declining to receive the note of Colonel Webb, he did not do so because he dreaded a controversy. He has shown himself a brave man, and disposed to render satisfaction to Mr. Graves. I do think that he has done so, and that the matter should end here." Mr. Wise replied, in substance: "Mr. Jones, Mr. Cilley has already expressed his respect for Mr. Graves, in the written correspondence, and Mr. Graves does not require of Mr. Cilley a certificate of character for Colonel Webb; he considers himself bound not only to preserve the respect due to himself, but to defend the honor of his friend, Colonel Webb. Mr. Graves only insists that he has not borne the note of a man who is not a man of honor and not a gentleman." The challenge was again renewed, and while the friends were loading the rifles, Mr. Wise and Mr. Jones walked apart, and Mr. Wise asked Mr. Jones "if Mr. Cilley could not assign the reason for declining to receive the note of Col. Webb, that he [Mr. Cilley] did not hold himself accountable to Colonel Webb for words spoken in debate?" Mr. Jones replied, that "Mr. Cilley would not assign that reason, because he did not wish to be understood as expressing the opinion whether he was or was not accountable for words spoken in debate." Mr. Wise then asked Mr. Jones whether "Mr. Cilley would not say that, in declining to receive the note of Colonel Webb, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, either directly or indirectly?" To which Mr. Jones replied affirmatively, adding, "Mr. Cilley entertains the highest respect for Mr. Graves, but declined to receive the note because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with Colonel Webb." Mr. Jones says that Mr. Wise took no exception to this answer, but continued to require other concessions, as stated, to be made. Mr. Wise says that in making that proposition he went beyond his instructions; and that the propsition and the response to it were not communicated to Mr. Graves, but were communicated both to Mr. Crittenden and to Mr. Menefee. Mr. Crittenden says he does not remember to have heard them, nor to have heard of them, during the progress of the contest, and that he does not remember to have given any advice or opinion upon them. Mr. Menefee remembers the proposition and reply, and positively or by acquiescence gave the advice that the reply, thus qualified, was but a reiteration, in substace, of the original ground assumed by Mr. Cilley, and held to be inadmissible by Mr. Graves. Mr. Wise had in his possession, on the ground, three written propositions, neither of which was exhibited, nor their substance submitted, in any other manner than as before stated.

Mr. Jones, Mr. Bynum, Mr. Schaumburg, Dr. Duncan, and Dr. Foltz, now objected, in the strongest language, against the further prosecution of the contest, and insisted that it should now cease, and that Mr. Graves should declare himself satisfied. Mr. Crittenden was understood again, by nearly all present, to concur in these views; but it appears, from his testimony, that he acquiesced in the views of Mr. Wise and Mr. Menefee. They insisted that the fight should go on, unless Mr. Cilley would make the concessions which were demanded; either a direct disclaimer of any personal exception to James Watson Webb, as a gentleman and a man of honor, in declining to receive his note, or an indirect disclaimer, by placing the refusal to receive it upon the ground of privilege; both of which Mr. Cilley, in the correspondence and throughout the affair upon the field, had refused to do, and, persisting in it, had twice received the fire of his antagonist.

Immediately previous to the last exchange of shots, Mr. Wise said to Mr. Jones, "If this matter is not terminated this shot, and is not settled, I will propose to shorten the distance." To which Mr. Jones replied, "After this shot, without effect, I will entertain the proposition." Mr. Graves had directed Mr. Wise, if they missed repeatedly, to prevent a prolongation of the affair by proposing closer quarters; in consequence of which, Mr. Wise made the proposition, which would have aggravated the severity of the terms. The rifles being loaded, the parties resumed their stations, and fired the third time, very nearly together. Mr. Cilley was shot through the body. He dropped his rifle, beckoned to one near him, and said to him, "I am shot," put both his hands to his wound, fell, and in two or three minutes expired.

Early in the day on which he fell, an agreement was entered into between James Watson Webb, Daniel Jackson, and William H. Morell, to arm themselves, repair to the room of Mr. Cilley, and force him to fight Webb with pistols on the spot, or to pledge his word of honor to give Webb a meeting before Mr. Graves; and, if Mr. Cilley would do neither, to shatter his right arm. They accordingly took measures to ascertain whether Mr. Cilley was at his lodgings; and finding that he was not, they proceeded, well armed, to Bladensburg, where it was said the duel between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley was to take place. Before arriving there, it was agreed between Webb, Jackson, and Morell, that Webb should approach Mr. Cilley, claim the quarrel, insist on fighting him, and assure him that if he aimed his rifle at Mr. Graves, he [Webb] would shoot him [Mr. Cilley] on the spot. It was supposed by them that Mr. Graves or Mr. Wise, or some of the party, would raise a weapon at Webb, whereupon it was agreed that Webb should instantly shoot Mr. Cilley, and that they should then defend themselves in the best way they could. Not finding the parties at Bladensburg, they followed in pursuit to the old Magazine, and thence to the shore of the Potomac, near the arsenal, at Greenleaf's Point, whence, it being after 3 o'clock, p. m. they returned to the city, to await the result. "It is unnecessary to add," say they, in a statement drawn up by Webb, signed by Jackson and Morell, and published in the New York Courier and Enquirer, "what would have been the course of Col. Webb, if Mr. Graves, instead of Mr. Cilley, had been injured. Suffice it to say, that it was sanctioned by us; and however much we deplored it, we could not doubt but the extraordinary position in which he would have been placed would have warranted the course determined upon." It is difficult to imagine what is here darkly shadowed forth, if it be not that, had Mr. Cilley survived the encounter with Mr. Graves, and had the latter suffered in it, it would then have been the fate of Mr. Cilley to have encountered an assassin.

Such were the material facts and circumstances which attended the death of Mr. Cilley. The committee, entertaining the opinion that the cause of the challenge was the cause of the death of Mr. Cilley, have sought for it where it should be found in the most authentic form, in the correspondence of the parties.

Mr. Cilley declined to receive the note of Mr. Webb, because he "chose to be drawn into no controversy with him." He placed his refusal to receive a demand for explanation of the words spoken by him in debate solely on the ground of his own voluntary election, without assigning any other reason. "He chose to be drawn into no controversy" with Webb. He declared, at the same time, that he neither affirmed nor denied any thing in regard to Webb's character, in declining to receive the note. He declared further, that he had before stated, and now repeated, that he intended by the refusal no disrespect to Mr. Graves, and that he had said this only in reply to a remark of Mr. Graves, that this course might place him in an unpleasant situation.

Mr. Graves, in his second note, takes but one exception to this first note of Mr. Cilley. "It does not disclaim any exception to him (Webb) personally as a gentleman." He says: "Your note of yesterday, in reply to mine of that date, is inexplicit, unsatisfactory, and insufficient; among other things in this—that, in your declining to receive Colonel Webb's communication, it does not disclaim any exception to him, personally, as a gentleman." "I have, therefore," he adds, "to inquire whether you declined to receive his communication on the ground of any personal exception to him as a gentleman or a man of honor? A categorical answer is expected."

Mr. Cilley, in his second note, regrets that his first was unsatisfactory, but cannot admit the right of Mr. Graves to propound the question, and, therefore, he declines any further response to it.

It is difficult to conceive that Mr. Graves, upon this correspondence of Mr. Cilley, could have challenged him for intending disrespect to Mr. Graves; for any such intention was positively disclaimed, and, as appears, in a most unexceptionable and courteous manner, in reply to a suggestion of his own, which called for it; or for affirming or denying any thing in regard to the character of Webb, in declining to receive his note; for any such affirmation or denial is also disclaimed, in equally positive terms. Mr. Cilley had declined to receive a call from James Watson Webb, for explanation of words spoken in debate in the House of Representatives, and had put his refusal solely on the ground that he chose to be drawn into no controversy with him; but he is pressed further, and interrogated beyond this limit, which he had assigned to himself, and a categorical answer is demanded to the question whether he declined on the ground of any personal exception to Webb as a gentleman or a man of honor. He denies the right to interrogate him in this manner for declining a call, which his right, and duty, as a member of the House of Representatives, and the just maintenance of the privileges of that body, required him to decline; and, denying the right to interrogate, he, therefore, refused to submit to answer any further. And it was because he refused to receive the note, and refused to answer any further, that he was challenged by another member of the same body.

This matter is not left open to inference or argument. The cause of the challenge appears in a manner which precludes all doubt. It is still further specified and avowed by Mr. Graves himself, in his own note, which contains the challenge. It is stated clearly, unequivocally, and with the utmost precision, and is assigned expressly, and in form, as the cause for which the challenge is given. "As you have declined accepting a communication which I bore to you from Colonel Webb, and as by your note of yesterday you have refused to decline on grounds which would exonerate me from all responsibility growing out of the affair, I am left no other alternative but to ask that satisfaction which is recognised among gentlemen." Mr. Cilley, by his "note of yesterday," had refused to answer the question to which a "categorical answer" had been demanded: that is to say, "whether he declined to receive Colonel Webb's communication on the ground of any personal exception to him as a gentleman or man of honor." The ground of challenge, therefore, is, by Mr. Graves himself, expressly stated to be, that Mr. Cilley declined to receive the communication from Webb, and, by his note of February 22d, refused to answer that question, touching the honor of Webb. This was the open and avowed cause, set forth and presented to Mr. Cilley, by which he was guided, and upon which he acted, in a matter involving the utmost extremity of human responsibility. For this cause, and for this alone, he was challenged and fell by the hand of Mr. Graves; unless it be admissible to believe that, after all verbal communication had ceased between him and his antagonist, and the difference had assumed the form exclusively of a written correspondence between them, he was challenged and fell for a cause not set up in that correspondence, not put forth as a ground of complaint, not made known to him or his friends as a matter of grievance, and in regard to which, therefore, it may be believed, he was profoundly ignorant, and had no opportunity afforded him in any way of voluntary satisfaction or explanation.

Nor is there any thing in what subsequently occurred, as disclosed by the joint statement of the seconds, or the testimony of any witness, which gives color to a suggestion, that there was, at any time afterwards, a change of the ground of controversy.

No communication whatever, upon the subject of difference, took place between the principals, their respective seconds, or friends, after the challenge was given, before the first exchange of shots. Of course, no change of the ground of controversy could have occurred until after Mr. Cilley had received the fire of his antagonist, and had hazarded his life in defence of the position which he had assumed in the correspondence. After the first exchange of shots, as already shown, Mr. Cilley re-asserted his original position, and Mr. Wise insisted that what was then said by Mr. Jones only placed "the affair upon the original grounds," and left "Mr. Graves precisely in the position in which he stood when the challenge was sent." There was, in fact, no change whatever in the position of the parties, except what arose from the circumstance that Mr. Cilley had given Mr. Graves the satisfaction demanded of an exchange of shots, and from the further circumstance that Mr. Cilley not only repeated the disclaimer that he had meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, but positively avowed, also, that he entertained for him the highest respect and the most kind feelings.

In this state of the controversy the challenge is renewed, and Mr. Cilley again puts his life in jeopardy. The challenge being once more suspended, he again insists upon his original position, that he had declined to receive the demand for explanation of the words spoken by him in debate, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with Webb, and that he would assign no other reason; and while, on the other hand, it was insisted for Mr. Graves that he considered himself bound not only to preserve the respect due to himself, but to defend the honor of his friend, Col. Webb, and that he only insisted "that he had not borne the note of a man who was not a man of honor and not a gentleman," Mr. Cilley replied affirmatively to a proposition submitted on the part of Mr. Graves, that in declining to receive the note, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, either directly or indirectly; and declared that he entertained the highest respect for him, but declined to receive the note, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with Col. Webb. He excluded, in direct and positive terms, every possibility of disrespect to Mr. Graves, directly or indirectly, and in effect only insisted on his right to decline a demand for explanation of words spoken in debate, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy upon the subject, without assigning any other reason. But he was interrogated for another reason, and another reason was demanded; and for resisting that demand the challenge was again renewed, and he fell a victim in defence of what he conceived to be his rights as an individual, or as a representative of the people in the House of Representatives.

The committee were disposed to pursue this inquiry in every form. Not content with tracing the cause of the challenge in the written correspondence, in the assignment of reasons for the challenge under Mr. Graves's own hand, and in the various propositions which were submitted on the field, from the beginning to the end of the contest, they proceeded to put to every witness who was believed to know any thing upon the subject, the direct inquiry, whether "Mr. Graves or his second, at any time before Mr. Cilley fell, communicated to Mr. Cilley, his second, or attendant friends, that a question of veracity between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley was a point of difficulty to be adjusted?" Mr. Jones answered, "Certainly not to me, nor to Mr. Cilley, at any time, to my knowledge, either before or during the day the duel was fought. I did not hear of the existence of such a question until the Sunday or Monday after Mr. Cilley was killed. The written correspondence between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley does not show the existence of any such question of veracity." Mr. Bynum answered, "I heard no such communication, directly or indirectly, from either Mr. Graves or his second, made or intimated to Mr. Cilley or any of his friends, before he fell." Mr. Schaumburg answered, "I did not understand that there was a 'question of veracity' between the parties, nor was there any conversation on the subject." Dr. Duncan answered, "They never did to my knowledge. I never heard the question of veracity assigned, during Mr. Cilley's life, as the cause of any difficulty." Mr. Pierce answered, "I never held any conversation with Mr. Graves, or 'his second or attendant friends,' in relation to the late fatal duel, nor did I ever hear, until subsequently to the 24th of February last, 'that any question of veracity between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley was a point of difficulty to be adjusted." Dr. Foltz answered, "They did not." Mr. Wise answered, "I do not know what Mr. Graves may have communicated to Mr. Cilley at any time before he fell, as to a question of veracity between them. I presume they both knew what had passed between them, verbally. I believe that I did state to Mr. Jones, or to other friends of Mr. Cilley, on the ground, that Mr. Graves said Mr. Cilley had assigned to him the reason for declining to receive the note of Colonel Webb, that he did not choose to be held accountable for words spoken in debate. I think I so informed Mr. Jones when I asked him if Mr. Cilley could not assign this reason on the ground; but of this I am not positive." Mr. Crittenden answered, "Not that I know of. I know of no communication between any of these parties other than as before stated, so far as I now recollect. Whether those communications involve any such question it is not for me to decide; no such question was made, in terms, that I know of." Mr. Menefee answered, "Mr. Graves had no communication of any kind with Mr. Cilley, his second, or attendant friends, and of course did not communicate to them that such a question was a point of difficulty. Nor did the second of Mr. Graves, as far as I remember, make such a communication, except so far as may be implied from the propositions made by him, in connection with the correspondence, &c. One, at least, of the friends of Mr. Graves, in the presence of his second, made frequent attempts to direct the attention of the second and friends of Mr. Cilley to the difficulty which was presented by the terms of Mr. Graves's first note (giving his version of what Mr. Cilley had said) and the ground which Mr. Cilley had subsequently assumed. But it was not referred to, in terms, as a question of veracity. It was believed that Mr. Cilley had honorable grounds, which would be satisfactory to Mr. Graves, and at the same time compatible with the truth, which would effect the object, without making directly such a question whilst efforts were pending to accommodate. Whether the views, thus expressed, were communicated to Mr. Cilley, I know not. For the character of what occurred on this point, so far as I participated in it, the committee are referred to my general statement."

Mr. Graves said to Dr. Foltz, on the way to the field, "That he had been the bearer of a note from Colonel Webb to Mr. Cilley, inquiring if Mr. Cilley had been correctly reported in the Globe. Mr. Cilley refused to receive the note, and declined giving his reasons, which implicated me, in consequence of which I challenged him, but I have no personal animosity towards him." Mr. Wise said on the field, "Mr. Jones, these gentlemen have come here without animosity towards each other; they are fighting merely upon a point of honor." "These men have nothing against each other; they are merely settling a point of honor."

This concurrent testimony of all, without exception, taken in connection with the written correspondence, the various propositions and answers on the field, and the further fact that Mr. Cilley had not been informed that Mr. Graves had undertaken to repeat to others any verbal communication between them, or that any misapprehension or misundestanding existed between them on that subject, utterly repels the suggestion, that any question of veracity had arisen, or had been made, or was the cause of the challenge, or of the death of Mr. Cilley. Indeed, any misapprehension on that subject would have given no more just ground of animosity, and least of all of the highly vindictive feelings necessarily aroused by a question of veracity, than the very evident misapprehension which Mr. Graves labored under in regard to some parts of the note of James Watson Webb, of which he was the bearer.

The committee will not, in justice to Mr. Graves, harbor the belief, that there were rankling secretly in his bosom any vindictive or hostile feelings towards Mr. Cilley, growing out of any question of personal veracity, and prompting him to carry on a deadly warfare under another pretext, not only without a direct and explicit disclosure of the real cause of difficulty, such as would have left no misapprehension on the mind of any one, but under circumstances which misled the other party and his friends, and left him, under that false impression, to the forfeit of his life.

The committee have, therefore, come to the conclusion, that the words spoken by Mr. Cilley in debate in the House of Representatives, the refusal of Mr. Cilley to receive a demand for explanation of those words, and his refusal to assign any other reason for it, than that he chose to be drawn into no difficulty upon the subject, were the causes which led to the death of Mr. Cilley, under the circumstances which have been substantially detailed.

It remains to inquire whether there has been a breach of the privileges of the House.

It is a breach of the highest constitutional privileges of the House, and of the most sacred rights of the people in the person of their representative, to demand, in a hostile manner, an explanation of words spoken in debate; to be the bearer of such a demand; to demand a reason for refusing to receive it, beyond the mere voluntary election of the member interrogated; or to demand, under any circumstances, any reason at all. No member can be questioned in a hostile way, and put to his plea, and yield to it, without subjecting himself to great disadvantages in the estimation of many, and impairing his influence and his usefulness as a member. It is a still more aggravated breach of the privileges of the House, and of the rights of the people in the person of their representative, to challenge a member, and to slay him in combat, for refusing to comply with any such demand. It is the highest offence which can be committed against either House of Congress; against the freedom of speech and of debate therein; against the spirit and the substance of that constitutional provision, that for any speech or debate in either House, the members shall not be questioned in any other place, and violates essentially the right of perfect immunity elsewhere for words spoken in debate here, which is essential to the independence of Congress, and to the existence of constitutional liberty. And when this offence is committed by a member, it calls for the exercise of the highest powers of the House to purge itself of the evil, to maintain effectually its rights and privileges, and to preserve inviolate this immunity, which is guarantied by the Constitution, not for the sake of the individual, but for his constituents and for the country.

The present case is without any circumstance of extenuation. A member of the House, in a manner most strictly parliamentary, on an occasion most appropriate, in language most decorous and moderate, in defence of the honor of the House against an anonymous and unfounded charge of corruption, had alluded to the published records of former proceedings with perfect truth and accuracy; had, in obedience to his duty, declined a hostile demand for explanation in a manner in which the committee can discover no cause of offence; had, respectfully, with expressions of regret, declined to admit the right to interrogate him further; had disclaimed all disrespect, directly or indirectly, towards his antagonist, and avowed for him the highest respect and the kindest feelings; and, after all this, avowed without hostility, and against the strongest protestations of others, he was required fatally, to expose himself to the third discharge of a rifle. On the other hand, Mr. Graves, a member of the House, voluntarily and unnecessarily became the bearer of a demand upon another member in attendance, for explanation of words spoken in debate; he presented it in the House while the House was in session; he demanded a reason for the refusal, beyond the voluntary election of that member to be drawn into no difficulty upon the subject; which being withheld, he then challenged him in this city, and slew him in this vicinity, while Congress was in session. Every step of Mr. Graves in this progress, involved him deeper and deeper in a breach of the privileges of the House, until their destruction was consummated in the person of Mr. Cilley. The eye of reason can discover, in the whole course of Mr. Cilley, no offence towards those who pursued him, except that given by alluding to the records of Congress, in the faithful and upright discharge of his duty as a member, which, justly, could have given no offence at all. Nor can his death be vindicated or excused by any circumstance whatsoever, not even by that custom, the relic of unenlightened and barbarous ages, which was formerly supposed to be a proof of some degree of physical courage, but is, in fact, a signal monument of the want of the higher attribute of moral courage; which has, in these modern times, degenerated into a game of chances and a scramble for undue advantages; which can furnish no criterion for truth, justice, or honor, and deals out its inflictions of misery most severely upon the unoffending and the helpless; which is deeply deplored by all men, even those who submit to it, and is forbidden, in every stage of it, by all law, human and divine.

It is not necessary, on the present occasion, to go into any consideration of the general power of the House to punish for breach of privilege; or to inquire into the origin and foundation of that power over contempts, which has been asserted by the Parliament of Great Britain, from time immemorial, by every legislative body, by every judicial tribunal from the highest to the lowest, and, repeatedly, by one or the other House of Congress, and has been recognised as existing in the House of Representatives by the Supreme Court of the United States. Whether it be a power necessary to the continued existence of the legislative body, or a power necessary to the free exercise of its legislative functions, it is in either case a necessary power, strictly granted by the Constitution, and as fully granted as if it were literally expressed. But in the case of members, the Constitution has expressly granted the power to punish for disorderly conduct; and has, also, expressly granted the power, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a member for any cause which two-thirds of the House may deem sufficient.

The committee, therefore, viewing the breach of the rights and privileges of the House, on the part of Mr. Graves, to have been an offence of this high character, against the vital principle of a deliberative assembly and of representative Government, feel constrained, by a sense of duty, to present to the House a resolution that he be expelled therefrom.

It has been decided by the House of Representatives, on a former occasion, that it was a breach of privilege to send a challenge to a member in attendance, or to be the bearer of such challenge. And it is equally so to act as second to the challenger. In the present instance it appears that Mr. Wise had no knowledge of the demand of explanation which was borne by Mr. Graves, and had never seen that paper until after the fatal catastrophe. But having been early consulted by Mr. Graves upon the first letter of Mr. Cilley, and concurred with him in his views of it, he bore the challenge to Mr. Cilley, and he acted throughout as the second of the challenger, advising and insisting that the fight should go on, until Mr. Cilley fell. The committee, therefore, deeming him deeply involved, under the circumstances which this case presents, in a breach of the privileges of the House, report a resolution that he deserves the decided censure of the House, and that he be censured accordingly.

Mr. Jones had no knowledge of the affair until the determination of Mr. Cilley had been formed as to the acceptance of the challenge, and the time, mode, weapon, and other preliminaries of the meeting. But he was the bearer of the acceptance, and acted throughout as the second of the challenged party; and it is the opinion of the committee that he was thereby involved in a breach of privilege, and that he be censured therefor.

In regard to the persons, not principal nor seconds, who were present on the field, and expressed their opinions at the request of the parties, without having advised, instigated, or procured the meeting, however they might be implicated in the courts of law, the committee entertain doubts how far they would be involved in a breach of privilege; and, under a strong conviction that the power of the House should be exercised, never in a doubtful case, always with moderation, they content themselves with presenting the facts and circumstances, so far as those persons are concerned, without proposing any action thereon.

The committee entertain no doubt that James Watson Webb has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House; but they also concur unanimously in the opinion, that if there be any real ground to believe that a conspiracy to assassinate actually existed, as set forth in that atrocious paper drawn up by him, signed by Daniel Jackson and William H. Morell, sworn to by the latter, and published in the New York Courier and Enquirer, he be left to the chastisement of the courts of law and of public opinion, and that the House will consult its own dignity and the public interests by bestowing upon him no further notice.

As soon as the report was read, as the Clerk was about to read the resolutions with which it concludes,

Mr. WISE asked leave to propound a question to the chairman of the committee, in justice to all the parties concerned.

Mr. TURNEY inquired if the reading of the whole paper was concluded?

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. TURNEY must then object to arresting it at this stage.

Mr. WISE would remark to the gentleman that the question came in pertinently at that time. It was a single question.

Mr. TURNEY would withdraw it for that purpose, but he should renew the objection if it arrested the reading of the report for any length of time.

Mr. WISE said it was one of serious import as respected himself as second in that affair, or he should not have interposed at that time. There was a general remark, as would be noticed by the House, in the report of the majority in relation to the general practice of duelling. Speaking of the character of that practice, they speak of it generally as a scramble for undue advantages. I merely wish, said Mr. W. to ask the chairman, to ask all the members of the committee, so that my remark may not be misunderstood by the world, or by any here present or absent, whether the least particle of the least conviction existed in the mind of any one member of that committee, that the least undue, or scramble for undue advantage, was taken, or attempted to be taken, in this fight? Whether the friends of the deceased did not think the fight was perfectly fair, and whether there was any evidence to show there was any undue advantage taken in any way, in any manner, by any of the parties?

Mr. TOUCEY said I will answer in the most positive manner, as far as I know, that it was not the intention of the committee, in that general remark, to make any application of it to this particular case, nor to accuse any one on the field for any scramble for undue advantage, or any thing that would be denominated unfair. Nor was there any evidence of any thing of the kind.

The resolutions with which the report concludes were then read as follows:

Resolved, That WILLIAM J. GRAVES, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, in bearing to the late JONATHAN CILLEY, then a member of this House, the demand for explanation of words spoken in debate, demanding his reasons for declining to receive it, and challenging him, and engaging in a late duel with him, which terminated in his death, has been guilty of a breach of the privilege of this House.

And be it further resolved, That the said W. J. G. for said breach of privilege be, and hereby is, expelled from this House.

Resolved, That HENRY A. WISE, in bearing a challenge to the late JONATHAN CILLEY, then a member of this House, and acting as a second to the challenger in the duel, which terminated in the death of Mr. CILLEY, has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House, and that he deserves the decided censure of this House, and hereby is censured accordingly.

Resolved, That GEO. W. JONES, in acting as second to the challenged party, the late JONATHAN CILLEY, then a member of this House, in the duel which terminated in his death, has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House, and that he be therefor, and hereby is, censured accordingly by this House.

Mr. HUNTER of Virginia, at this stage, moved an adjournment: lost.

The report, or counter-report, of Messrs. GRENNELL and RARIDEN was then read through by the Clerk, and having been concluded,

Mr. BRONSON moved that the House do adjourn; which motion was carried in the negative.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the report of Mr. ELMORE, another member of the select committee.

As soon as the reading of the above report was concluded—

Mr. TOUCEY obtained the floor, and, on his motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1838.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Navy Department, enclosing in compliance with the resolution of the 5th of March last, sundry documents in relation to Navy Pension agents: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented a memorial of a bank in Boston, praying to be indemnified for depreciated bank notes, received from the collector of the customs; which together with a communication from the collector on the subject, was referred to the Committre on Finance.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the petition of Johnson and Shraver, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution, for the purchase of an island at the confluence of the St. Peters and Mississippi rivers; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill supplementary to the act, entitled an act to amend the act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians, was read the third time and passed.

The report of the select committee, appointed to inquire into the charges against the honorable JOHN RUGGLES (declaring in substance that the said charges are wholly groundless) was considered, and concurred in.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill to allow the inhabitants of township eight north, range twenty-one west, to enter a section of land, in lieu of the 16th section; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, the Senate took up the bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States.

Mr. MERRICK submitted an amendment, requiring the solicitor of the board to file written arguments in behalf of the United States, when required to do so by the board, and prohibiting said solicitor from engaging in the practice of the law: agreed to.

Mr. NORVELL here addresseed the Senate generally in opposition to the bill.

Mr. KING expressed his disapprobation at the amendment just adopted. He was of the opinion that it should be made imperative on the solicitor to file answers in behalf of the United States in every case, whether required to do so by the board or not; and he intimated his intention of offering an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MERRICK replied. He thought that there would be a great many cases so plain, and so trifling in amount, as to require no argument at all, and where a plain statement of facts would be all that could be necessary. Mr. M. made a few additional observations in favor of the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD was opposed to the fifth section altogether. He thought no solicitor would be necessary, and that a competent board of commissioners would be all that was required to do justice both to the United States and to the claimants. After some remarks at length in support of the bill,

A debate ensued, in which it was supported by Messrs. PRENTISS, HUBBARD, NILES, BUCHANAN, BAYARD, and CLAY of Alabama, and opposed by Messrs. NORVELL, CALHOUN, and BENTON.

Mr. TIPTON spoke in favor of the general principles of the bill, but was opposed to the high salaries provided for. He thought $1,800 each would be amply sufficient for the commissioners, and $800 for the clerk, instead of $3,000 and $1,400. If the friends of the bill, he said, would not consent to cut down the salaries, he would vote against it.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay the bill on the table, with a view to the appointment of a select committee to take into consideration the subject of claims on Congress, and to devise some mode of legislation with regard to them that would remedy the evils and inconveniences that had caused the introduction of the bill.

On taking the question, Mr. CALHOUN's motion was rejected—yeas 13, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Lumpkin, Morris, Norvell, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Trotter, Wright, and Young—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Walker, White, and Williams—27.

After some remarks from Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, SEVIER, HUBBARD, WHITE, and LINN,

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out the 5th section, which provides for the appointment of a solicitor; and this motion being agreed to,

Mr. BAYARD moved to amend the bill further by making the number of commissioners two, instead of three. This amendment was also agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out the 4th section, which allows claimants to appear before the Board by counsel: agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS expressed a wish to address the Senate on the subject; but, on account of the lateness of the hour, preferred postponing his remarks till to-morrow.

On the motion of this gentleman, then,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, April 26, 1838.

The SPEAKER, on leave, laid before the House sundry communications, viz:

1. From the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the amount received from the sales of public lands in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, in reference to the Cumberland Road, together with a statement of the amount of money appropriated for the Cumberland Road, &c.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid on the table.

2. A communication from the Secretary of the Navy, correcting an error in a former report in relation to the date of appointment of the scientific corps of the Exploring Expedition.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

3. From the Postmaster General, in relation to the number of failures of the New York express mail, to the first of January last.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

4. From the Postmaster General, transmitting a report of the irregularities and failures of the great western mail, between Washington City and Wheeling, within the last three months, together with the causes thereof, so far as they are known to that Department.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, laid on the table.

Mr. SERGEANT, on leave, presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce, of Philadelphia, praying for appropriations for repairing and improving the harbors of the river and bay of Delaware, with sundry accompanying documents, which, on his motion, were all referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Petitions, on leave, were also presented by Mr. BOULDIN of Virginia and Mr. LYON of Alabama.

Mr. HEROD, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of so changing mail route No. 2569, in Indiana, as to cause the same to pass through Farmington, in Hamilton county, in said State.

Sundry Senate bills, on the SPEAKER'S table, were, at the suggestion of Mr. BRIGGS, by general consent, taken up, read twice, and referred to the appropriate standing committees.

THE LATE DUEL.

The unfinished business being the report of the select committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, was then resumed.

The question still pending was on the motion of Mr. TOUCEY, under the unanimous direction of the committee, to print and postpone the same till Monday week.

Mr. TOUCEY was entitled to the floor, but before he proceeded, Mr. WISE called for the reading of the remainder of the reports, being the testimony taken in the investigation.

The CLERK proceeded till about a quarter past 3 o'clock, when the CHAIR announced that a message was in attendence from the President of the United States, and said that with the unanimous consent of the House it would be received.

Mr. SAWYER rose and objected.

The SPEAKER said it was a very delicate question, and hoped it would not be raised.

Mr. SAWYER said he considered the subject before the House a solemn farce, and he trusted that no business would be interposed before it was settled.

The SPEAKER said he knew of no instance in which a message from the Chief Magistrate had been refused. It was a delicate question between the parliamentary rule, that pending a question of privilege no other business could be entertained, and the constitutional right of the Chief Magistrate to make a communication to the House. He repeated that he hoped that question would not be raised, as the communication would be laid upon the table, and would present no obstacle to the proceeding of the House.

Mr. SAWYER said he understood the Chair as having decided, that no business could be interposed during this proceeding.

The SPEAKER said that the Chair had decided, that according to the parliamentary rule, no business could be interposed, without the unanimous consent of the House; and inquired if the gentleman waived his objection.

[Cries of leave, leave.]

Mr. SAWYER said he adhered to his objection.

The SPEAKER said, that if the Chair was compelled to decide between the parliamentary rule, and the constitutional right of the President to send a message to the House at any time, he should decide that the message must be received; but he hoped the question would not be raised at that time; and trusted the objection would be withdrawn.

[Cries of leave, leave.]

Mr. SAWYER then waived his objection; and the message was received, by the hands of ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, esq. the President's private secretary.

Mr. HOWARD gave notice that, before the House adjourned to-day, he should ask leave to have the message read and referred.

The reading of the testimony in the duel investigation was then resumed, and proceeded in till shortly after 4 o'clock, when, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, April 27, 1838.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of the heirs of ——— Powell, a surgeon in the Revolutionary army, praying commutation: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented a memorial, or rather a remonstrance, signed by a delegation of Cherokee and Choctaw Indians, from the west of the Mississippi, against the adoption of the Territorial Government, as contemplated by a bill now pending in the Senate. These Indians, many of whom were educated men, stated that some of the tribes were wild Indians, with whom they did not desire to be associated. Opothle Yoholo he was personally acquainted with. From information he had received in relation to this matter, he did not know when that subject came up, but he would move to postpone the bill indefinitely. He would move that the remonstrance be laid on the table and printed. The reading of the memorial having been called for, the Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, April 26, 1838.

To the Hon. President of the Senate, and Speaker and members of the House of Representatives:

The undersigned memorialists, having learnt since their arrival in this city, that a bill, denominated a bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, had been introduced, and is pending before the Senate of the United States, respectfully beg leave, in behalf of our nations, to represent to your honorable bodies that the provisions therein contained, are calculated to excite dissatisfaction and distrust in the minds of our people; and as we have removed and settled in the West, under the firm pledge of the Government of the United States to protect us, and that we should be permitted to remain free from the operations of any State or Territorial laws, we pray that Congress will not embrace our nations in the said Territorial limits.

R. M. JONES, GEORGE W. HARKINS, PIERRE JUZONE, Choctaw Delegation.

OPOTHLE YOHOLO, his x mark; ROLLY MCINTOSH, his x mark; FUSHATCHE HICCO, his x mark; SITCHY CORNELLE, his x mark; JAMES ISLANDS, his x mark; NE-HI YOHOLO, his x mark; JIM BOY, his x mark.

In presence of JOHN MCINTOSH, Interpreter Creek Delegation; JAS. L. ALEXANDER, BARENT DUBOIS.

Mr. TIPTON said he would oppose no obstacle to the printing of the memorial introduced by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] He did not know but he would have presented it himself, if the memorialists had asked him to do so. It was not his desire to thwart the wishes of any of the Indians, if those wishes were honest and proper.

It was our duty, as he had no doubt it was the wish, of every Senator to hear all that could be said for or against the important measure, (the bill for organizing the Indian Territory,) which the honorable member had told us he would, when it came up, move to lay on the table; but, as statesmen, we had a right to look into the motives of those who present themselves here as memorialists. The first inquiry is, who are they, and what their object? The Senator has told us that he is personally acquainted with Opothle Yoholo, and some others, who had signed the paper read by the Secretary. I, said Mr. T. am acquainted with some of those whose names are appended to that paper. The name and the doings of Opothle Yoholo have made an impression on my mind that will never escape me. If we review past scenes, we cannot but remember that this same man was in our possession, and his country was ours, by the laws of war, in 1814. We spared his life, and restored his country, and condescended to purchase that same country from his tribe; and we are under obligations to find them a permanent home in the country west of the Mississippi. A majority of the Creek tribe have removed to, and located themselves in, the country given to them in exchange for their lands east of the Mississippi.

Jones, the Choctaw, whose name is appended to the paper in question, is personally known to me; he is an educated Indian belonging to the Choctaws west of the Mississippi; and what, I would inquire,

's his business here? I hope, said Mr. T. that my honorable friend from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] will inform us what constitutes a part of Mr. Jones's business in this city at this time. It will, I am fearful, be found similar to that of Porkes, a Shawanoe, who left this a few days since. He [Porkes] belongs to the Shawanoes west, and came here to protest against the payment of a debt justly, as I have reason to believe, due from his tribe to G. C. Johnson of Ohio. The commissioner who negotiated a treaty with the Shawanoes, and stipulated with them for the purchase of their land in Ohio, and for their removal west, it seems, told the Indians that the Government would pay all their debts; but on an investigation of the claims against them, the debts found due amounted to more than the value of their lands. A representation of the case was made to the Government, and Congress, in 1832, appropriated thirty thousand dollars as an additional compensation for their land. The debts had been investigated in full council, and acknowledged to be just, and drafts drawn on the Executive for the sum due Mr. Johnson. This paper was signed by the chiefs and principal men of the tribe, before they left Ohio, but remained unpaid; and another paper, asking the Executive to pay the debt, it seems, was prepared and signed by the chiefs and head men, and many common Indians of the tribe, since they reached their new homes in the West. This paper bears the certificate of the Indian agent that it was read, explained, and fully understood, by the Indians in council; and yet this Mr. Porkes comes here with a remonstrance, signed by some four or five Indians, one of them a chief who had signed the papers asking the payment of the debt that Porkes now tells us is unjust. I mention this case, sir, to show with what caution we should receive petitions or remonstrances coming from chiefs, or from persons interested in these matters.

The remonstrance, we are told by the honorable member, is signed by the delegation of Creeks and Choctaws now in this city. Will he tell us how many of these men are chiefs, and by what authority they are here making an effort to control the action of this Government? Have they been brought here by an accredited agent of the Government to enter their protest?

Their protest is against a leading measure of the late and present Administration. We have, by our treaties and laws, promised to secure to the Indians a permanent home west of the Mississippi, and to secure them their lands by patent. The lands for these tribes have been set off by metes and bounds, and patents are now being prepared at the proper department, and will, in a short time, be ready for delivery. And will the honorable member persist in his intended motion to defeat the passage of the measure presented by the Administration he supports, to protect and preserve the people, and to protect our frontier States west of the Mississippi?

Indiana has but little interest in the matter. She has but about three thousand within her limits. Should they become hostile, and kill one of my neighbors, they will be swept from existence without orders from this city. But there is no fear of hostility between us and our Indians; they know us, and we understand them. Can the honorable Senator say as much for his own State? There is still within the limits of Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee a large body of Indians, possessing not the best feelings in the world; with these Indians we have treaties in progress of execution. I would ask, is there not danger of a rupture in that quarter, by countenancing opposition to what we know to be the policy of the Government and the wishes of the people of all the States east of the Mississippi? Should one drop of blood be shed there, the people of the States interested and assailed will massacre their Indian neighbors. The fastnesses of their mountains cannot save them. There are no swamps or everglades similar to those in Florida, for the Indians of Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama to fly to for shelter.

If we desire to be permanently beneficial to these people, we must elevate their habit of thinking or of acting. The game is all disappearing; they cannot live by hunting; we must teach them division of property and labor. We must do more: we should assist them in establishing a Government, and creating offices for the better informed to aspire to. We must elevate the character of the poorer Indians; the readiest way to do this is to divide the annuity paid these people agreeably to the regulations adopted by the late Administration, and practised only by the present, of dividing the annuity to the heads of families, and not to the chiefs.

The provisions of the act of 1834, organizing the Indian Department, provides that the annuity shall be paid to the chiefs, or to such persons as they may select. It will be recollected, said Mr. T. that when this bill was before the Senate, I objected to that provision. What I then anticipated has been fully sustained by the practical operation of that law. It has a most ruinous effect upon the chiefs, and others who influence them to permit them to receive the money due their tribe in large masses, and divide it as they think proper. The poor Indians are too often defrauded out of most or all of the money due from our Government. This mode of procuring large sums of money has a most corrupting influence on the chiefs and those who may be in their interest. Officers in the employ of our Government can easily influence the chiefs to ask leave to visit the seat of Government to complain of something that has been done or left undone. A public officer comes along, of course, and figures in steamboats and stages, on the way here, as the conductor of a delegation of Indians from the far West. Here they are introduced to public offices and officers, places of public amusement, and in the galleries of the halls of Congress, all at the public expense, not to serve the Government or to benefit the Indians. No question can arise between the United States and the Indians but can be as well settled by the agent, if he is a capable man, under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as by bringing them here.

Again, sir, said Mr. T. we have removed a large number of Indians from the States east, and have placed them on the western border of Missouri and Arkansas. We have promised to protect the people of these States from harm; and I have no doubt the best mode of saving the Indians, and protecting our own people, is to give them a Government, and bring them under the influence of laws.

Of the twenty-eight tribes now in the Territory, eleven have expressed a wish to come into the confederacy, and we have good reason to believe that other tribes will sanction the measure, and join the confederacy. Do those who remonstrate against the passage of the bill that the Senator mentions, know that no tribe is affected by the passage of the bill? If they do not wish to join them, let them remain on their own land, and attend to their own business, in their own way, under the protection of our Government. Mr. T. said he regretted saying so much on this motion to print, but he felt called on to expose the conduct of every one concerned in getting up this remonstrance. He did not censure the honorable member who introduced it; he was actuated, no doubt, by good motives; but he alluded to those who bring Indians here to oppose the measures of Government, and put words in their mouths for that wicked purpose.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, rose to make a short explanation in reply to the remarks made by the Senator from Indiana. He certainly had no intention of bringing up a debate now, and he had said as little as was necessary to explain the objects of the remonstrance. With regard to the bill, to which the Senator attached so much importance, he, Mr. C. did not understand it as being for the protection of Missouri and Arkansas: he understood it to be for the purpose of organizing the Indian Territory, and that there was a separate and distinct bill for the other object. As far as his knowledge extended, Mr. C. said, he did think that the honorable gentleman had done great injustice to the Creeks, who had drawn up this remonstrance, and that he was mistaken in supposing them to be any part of the hostiles of that tribe in the late Creek war who took the field against the State of Alabama. The gentleman did great injustice to the character of Opothle Yoholo and other chiefs.

Mr. TIPTON said he spoke of the influence which the chiefs exerted in the war of 1815, in inducing the Indians to make war on the persons and property of our people.

The bill need not affect the petitioners, nor any other portion of the tribes who did not desire it. It would not compel them them to enter into the Confederation, if they wished not to do so. Eleven of the tribes asked for a Territorial Government, but if any of the tribes wished to remain out, they were at liberty to do so. This remonstrance, therefore, was entirely uncalled for, and unnecessary.

Mr. C. continued. He misunderstood the Senator in supposing that he alluded to the late Creek war, when it was the war of 1813 to which he referred. He, Mr. C. did not know what was the conduct of Opothle Yoholo, Jim Boy and others, in that war; he had reference to the late Creek war, in which he knew they were fighting on the side of Alabama. Under arrangements that he himself made with them, they took the field with more than 1000 warriors, and he well knew the prompt manner in which they complied with their engagements. With a deliberation of only fifteen minutes, they promptly answered that they were ready to take the field, and that all they wanted from the whites was to stand on one side of the swamp, to shoot down the hostiles, as they entered on the other side and drove them out of it. Now he could not forget the conduct of these chiefs, who had performed, in good faith, all that they promised. These men were not carried to the West in irons, as alluded to by the Senator from Indiana, and the Senator was, therefore, mistaken in that particular. They were hurried off under the injunctions of General Jesup, by which they had encountered serious losses, as they alleged; and though many of them might have been hostiles in 1813, as a large portion of the nation were, there was no evidence that such was the fact, and it was known that much the larger portion of the nation took part with the United States.

These memorialists allude to the fact of a treaty with the Choctaws, who, they allege, have always been friendly to the whites, in which the inducement held out to them to remove westward was that they should be permitted to govern themselves, by their own laws and usages, without any interference whatever on the part of the whites. These two tribes came forward, and asked to be excepted from the provisions of this bill. He did not know that the bill included these tribes, but they did not wish to seem to be included in it. Mr. C. would ask if it was acting in good faith, and in accordance with the spirit of the treaties with these tribes, and was it consistent with the good of the country, to force them into this Confederacy, contrary to their wishes. He would briefly state how he came to be charged with the presentation of this memorial: He received, in the first place, a message from Opothle Yoholo, with whom he had become acquainted at the late treaty, requesting a copy of the bill; this was sent to him; and, after it had been explained to him, and to the Choctaws, he sent another message, asking for a personal interview. A meeting took place in consequence, and, in answer to his objections, he was informed that it was not to him (Mr. C.) he must address himself, but to the Congress of the United States. It was in this way he supposed that the petition had come into his hands. With respect to the bill, if he found it obnoxious to the objection stated, he should vote against it, or vote to lay it on the table; as he did not see the propriety of forming this confederacy to be composed of tribes, some of which are not intelligent enough to enter into it, and others, the enlightened ones, being opposed to it altogether.

Mr. WHITE replied at some length to the allusions of the Senator from Indiana, and to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] but was not distinctly heard by the reporter. He was understood to maintain, that the bill to which the memorialists had alluded would be the means of securing to, and protecting in their just rights, all the Indians that would be embraced in its provisions. It would also materially tend to lessen the expenses of the Government in relation to that matter, and finally dispense with them entirely. He sincerely trusted that the bill would not be prejudiced by the remarks which had fallen from the Senator. The true policy of the Government was to elevate the Indian character, by enlarging and cultivating their moral qualities, by infusing in them a proper spirit of self-respect and dependence upon their own resources, their own individual and united exertions. He would give them lands in fee simple, and issue patents to them, by which means they would be secured from the pressure and intrusion of the whites. The measure, on the part of the Government towards the Indians, was a benign and wholesome one. It never contemplated to force them into the adoption of its provisions against their will; they were left free to act; they might either come into the measure or reject it. Mr. W. expressed a wish, when the bill was taken up the other day and postponed, after the very excellent speech of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. TIPTON,] that when it came to be discussed, that it would be brought to a final issue, and he would again repeat that desire. He felt sorry that any debate had arisen on this question; he did not intend to have opened his lips, nor should he, had not he been alluded to in the remarks. He regretted that he had been compelled to say so much. Mr. W. concluded by observing that he was well convinced that the Senator from Alabama would never withhold his vote from that bill at the instance of any red people. He was persuaded that when that Senator came to examine it with his usual care and attention, that he would not only give his vote, but his argument, in favor of a measure that he (Mr. W.) believed, before God and man, was among the most praiseworthy that had ever been entertained by any Government.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama repeated again that he had no idea of bringing on a discussion on this subject, and he confessed that he had not prepared himself by a critical examination of the provisions of the bill to go into its merits. He always felt the greatest deference and respect for the opinions of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, and placed much confidence in his experience and judgment; and he should, therefore, give every possible consideration to the subject. If, on examination, he should come to the conclusion that the bill was calculated for the protection of the frontiers as well as of the Indians, and that simplicity and economy in the management of our Indian affairs would be promoted by it, he would very cheerfully give it his support.

Mr. SEVIER said there was not a Choctaw chief in the city that he knew of; that those of that nation who were here were only citizens of the tribe, and not chiefs; that one or two of them were merchants, and that the balance of them were here on the private affairs of the nation. So far as he understood their business, they had no authority from their nation to speak upon this or any other general interests of the tribe; and, therefore, he must consider their movement in this matter gratuitous, wholly uncalled for, and calculated to thwart the views of the Administration, and do great injury, not only to themselves, but to the other tribes, for whose benefit it is proposed to pass the bill.

With regard to the Creek chief, Opothle Yoholo, Mr. S. said he did not know him personally, although he was a neighbor, and a kind of quasi constituent of his, and on that account he would, in the kindest spirit, take the liberty of giving him a little piece of good advice, not only upon this subject, but upon another. I would advise him to attend to the business which brought him here, and not to meddle in the affairs of the Government. One of the first things which he discovered his red brother to be driving at, was to get the agent of the Government for the Creeks removed. He has addressed a letter to you, sir, [Mr. KING of Alabama] and your colleague, requesting your influence with the President to get the agent removed, and to get another, (one of your constituents, Mr. Abbott,) appointed in his place. And what is the reason he assigns for wishing this change? He says that the former agent, Mr. Sandford, had promised him that he should be consulted upon this subject, etc. I will tell my red brother that Mr. Sandford had no authority to make him such a promise, and that he has got a good agent now, who will please him when he knows him, and that my advice to him is, to accept him willingly, and say no more upon this subject.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama explained. The Senator misunderstood the letter of Opothle Yoholo. The writer says that Gen. Sandford, the late agent, promised them that he would previously notify them of his resignation, in order that they might have the opportunity of advising in the appointment of his successor.

Mr. SEVIER continued. From this movement, and from what we have just seen, he thought his friend was disposed to play a great game. He had come here, as he understood, with claims on the Government for personal injuries inflicted upon him by the conduct of Gen. Jesup; and if his claims were well-founded, he was disposed to aid him as far as possible. The Senator from Alabama has spoken warmly in the praise of this Chief, and I am not disposed to detract any thing from the eulogy he has received. But he must say that he had labored under a great misapprehension, if it were true that he had always been the friend of the whites. He had thought otherwise. He had thought he had been inimical to the interests of the whites, and to the friendly Creeks. He had always understood that he was at the head of those who had murdered old McIntosh, the unwavering friend of the United States. This was the universal impression in our part of the United States. It was the impression among the Creeks themselves; for Chilly McIntosh, the son of the martyr, who is at present one of the Chiefs of the Creek Indians, and always the friend of the whites, and who had long since removed west of the Mississippi, told Yoholo he could not stay in his country, and the reason of this was, that he had murdered Chilly's father, some years before, on account of a treaty made with the Government. And here I must beg leave to relate a little history, as I have had it, and believe it to be true. Chilly had a sister, who seemed more embittered against Yoholo, than Chilly himself. She was determined he should be punished for his conduct to her father. She told Chilly he was a chief and warrior, and ought to demean himself as one, and as the son of their murdered father, he must without delay call Yoholo to an account, and decide the matter by personal combat; and that if he was too pusillanimous to do it, that she would undertake it herself. Such was the deadly feud between the parties, that Gen. Arbuckle and the superintendent had to make peace between them. Mr. S. said he would advise his friend and guardian constituent to attend to his own business, and let the concerns of the United States alone, for when he found him poaching on that manor, he Mr. S. should most unquestionably oppose and defeat his proposition if he could. Mr. S. said that all the other tribes combined which had removed, would not make up half the number of the Creeks, Choctaws, and Cherokees. These men knew very well that if the course recommended by the bill was pursued, and the individuals of the tribes enlightened, that the influence of the chiefs would sink in the dust. What was the practice with regard to these annuities? The nation, by the treaty stipulations, was to be paid pro rata or rather per capite, and some four or five chiefs generally got the whole, while a common Indian never saw a dollar of it. The bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, was the only measure that would have a tendency to correct these evils; and he had not the slightest doubt but when his friend from Alabama came to investigate the subject, that so far from voting to postpone the bill indefinitely, he would be among the first to lend it his very able and zealous support.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama did not wish any erroneous impressions to go abroad with regard to these people, who had thought proper to entrust their remonstrance to his charge. They did not represent themselves as chiefs, but as delegates. Opothle Yoholo was not sent across the Mississippi in irons, though it was true that some of the hostiles were. The object of Opothle Yoholo in visiting this city was to get indemnity for property lost by him in consequence of his being hurried off by the agent of the Government before he had time to secure it. He, Mr. C. learned this from a very high-minded and honorable man, Capt. Armstrong, the Indian agent.

Mr. SEVIER said that he was mistaken in supposing that Opothle Yoholo had been sent across the Mississippi in irons, though he knew that many of the hostiles were.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama. No, sir; he fought our battles, and deserves rather better treatment than he receives.

The memorial was then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that two or three days ago he presented a memorial asking Congress for an appropriation to repair the piers at Reedy Island, in the Delaware. The necessity of these repairs appeared evident from a correspondence between Capt. Valette, of the army and the Secretary of War. He, Mr. B. wished that correspondence to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce; and he begged leave to call the particular attention of the chairman of that committee to the subject. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the resolution of the Senate instructing them to inquire into the expediency of amending the law of 1830 in relation to the importation of railroad iron, moved to be discharged from the further consideration thereof: agreed to.

Mr. W. also moved that the said committee be discharged from the further consideration of two memorials from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, asking the establishment of the warehousing system, on the ground that the memorialists did not ask for such a system as the committee believed that Congress would adopt, or that it would be wise to adopt: agreed to.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which had been referred the resolution of the Senate inquiring into the expediency of refunding to certain merchants of Mobile the sums paid by them on the renewal of duty bonds, moved to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, on the ground that it would be inexpedient to legislate on the subject without passing a general law embracing all such cases: agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred the bill from the House making appropriation for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, reported the same without amendment, recommending its passage; and gave notice that he should call the bill up at an early day.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Henry H. Marsh; which was, by general consent, twice read, and referred to the Committee on Pbulic Lands.

The following resolutions were submitted, and by general consent, considered and adopted:

By Mr. TROTTER:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Aberdeen, by Fulton, to Jacinto, in the State of Mississippi; and, also, from Fulton to Russellville, in the State of Alabama.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing, or modifying, an act for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund, passed March 3, 1837, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize payment to be made to the Missouri volunteers, for their services in 1829 and 1836: read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the bill was so amended that the decision of the Board of Claims, together with all the evidence in each case, and the opinion of the board, should be presented to Congress during the first ten days of each annual session.

Mr. TIPTON moved to strike out the sum of

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

$3000, as fixed for the compensation of each commissioner, and insert $2,500, and on this question he asked the yeas and nays, when there appeared for the motion 13, against it 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Lumpkin, Norvell, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, White, and Young—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Spence, Trotter, Williams, and Wright—23.

Mr. BENTON moved to further amend the bill by providing an eighth section, that no member of Congress, or delegate, nor any person holding an office under the United States, should act as attorney or advocate in prosecuting any claim before the board.

The bill was warmly advocated by Messrs. HUBBARD, BUCHANAN, BAYARD, and others, and opposed by Messrs. MORRIS, CALHOUN, BENTON, NORVELL, and others.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and carried by a vote of 23 to 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Spence, Swift, Tipton, and Williams—23.

The following is the bill, as ordered to be engrossed:

A BILL to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, constituted and established a board of commissioners of claims, whose duty it shall be to hear and examine with care and diligence on behalf of the United States all claims against the United States not exclusively within the province of the accounting officers of the Government to adjust and allow, or which may require the special legislation of Congress, and report a brief statement of each case, with the facts proved, and their opinion thereon, to Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall have power to make all needful rules for the regulation of the proceedings before them, and for the taking and authenticating of testimony concerning any claim; and may, whenever in their opinion it may be requisite, issue a commission to take testimony, and prescribe the mode of executing such commission, and the oath to be administered, as well to the person appointed to take the testimony as to the witnesses to be by him examined.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said board shall cause commissions to issue for the taking of testimony in any one of the States or Territories, or in any foreign country, under such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as may be prescribed by the said board of commissioners. SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the contingent expenses of said commissioners shall be paid under the supervision of the Secretary of State of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the decision of said Board of Commissioner, in all cases of claims made during the recess of Congress, with all the evidence in each case, together with the opinion of the said board, shall be presented to Congress during the first ten days of each annual session.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no member of Congress, or delegate from any Territory, or any person holding an office under the United States, shall appear before said board as agent, attorney, or advocate in prosecuting a claim, or act as such in any way whatever.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, April 27, 1838.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, and by general consent, the following message from the President of the United States, received yesterday, was taken up:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In partial compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ult. calling for further information on the relations between the United States and the Mexican Republic, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

(Signed) M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, 26th April, 1838.

[The message was accompanied by a report from the Secretary of State, and a mass of correspondence. The report set forth the reasons why the whole had not been sent in, substantially that all that was most material was furnished; that the whole was very voluminous, and had been received at so late a period that there has been insufficient time for translation, &c.]

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the whole was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER, on leave, laid before the House two Executive communications, viz:

1. From the Postmaster General, in relation to an unsettled balance, due from ——— Crockett, Postmaster at Frankfort, Ky. and Francis P. Blair, as security.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid on the table.

2. From the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, containing copies of all contracts made in his office, in the year 1837, with the names of the applicants for said contracts, and the amount of their respective bids.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. SERGEANT, on leave, presented some resolutions of the councils of the city of Philadelphia, in favor of the construction of a dry dock at that place; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE LATE DUEL.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the late Mr. CILLEY. The question was on the unanimous motion of the committee (through Mr. TOUCEY, the chairman) to print and postpone it till Monday week.

The reading of the testimony was resumed, and was concluded at one o'clock.

Mr. WISE then called for the reading of the journal of the committee, saying that he considered it all-important to a correct understanding of the case.

The reading was accordingly ordered, and the clerk proceeded to read the journal which, having been completed,

Mr. TOUCEY said, the House had imposed upon the committee a most delicate and responsible duty. The committee had performed it to the best of their ability, and with fidelity. They had not been careful to inquire who would stand by them in the House, but they had performed their duty with care and impartiality. If it was the pleasure of the House to retrace their steps—to go over again the mass of evidence and memorials presented to the committee, it was no part of their duty to complain. There are now objections made to the publication of the report and evidence; and if the objection had any foundation at all, if it was correctly taken by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] and by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] if it was correctly taken at all, it goes to annihilate the powers of the committee, and all that they have done would be correctly suppressed. That view had not been unobserved; it had been repeatedly pressed during the discussion; and the very gentlemen who took that ground had abandoned it, and now acknowledge that it has no application at all to the present case. I am not about to contend that if a standing committee—the Committee on Indian Affairs, for instance—should be instructed to inquire into a general matter, and should find a member involved in a question of privilege, that they could go into that inquiry at all. They must report to the House, mentioning the member involved in the question of privilege, and then the House could give that committee, or some other committee, authority to inquire. The rule, he said, was a sound and salutary rule for the government of such committees, but it ought not to be perverted to a case to which it has no application at all. If the rule has application to this committee, there is no half-way ground; you must throw the report under the table. You should not let in one portion—if the rule applies—either of the report, or evidence, or journal, because the committee had no power at all. And though the committee has cause to complain of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] that the committee had committed a greater breach of privilege than had been committed by those whose hands were imbrued in blood, he hoped they would be excused in doing so, because they had followed the precedent set by him [Mr. A.] in his better days, while he was a member of the other branch of Congress.

Mr. T. read the rule, and then said the question of privilege was one to be decided by the whole House. It is the privilege of the whole House, and is not the peculiar privilege of a member, except as he stands in relation to the whole House. Every member may insist, and must insist, if upon a trial for a question of privilege by the whole House; and a committee is ordered upon a general inquiry, they cannot touch such a question, because the question of privilege has not been referred to them. They cannot go into an examination secretly, and turn a mass of evidence into the House like a thunder-bolt. They cannot do it. They have no authority. They must report to the House. If the rule has any application whatever in this case, the committee had no authority whatever. They could only have reported the fact, (as had been mentioned,) the single fact, that these members of the House were implicated in the duel they were required to investigate.

But the gentlemen who had pressed the objection with the greatest power, abandoned it the next moment, and now say the committee had full power to go into the evidence, and throw it into the House in the usual form of proceeding of such a committee, under the authority of the House. He would say the rule had no application in this case, because the House had, at the very commencement, referred, in express terms, the whole matter to the committee, and ordered them to go into the whole inquiry, and report upon it to the House. Therefore, the order had been strictly complied with—the committee had performed their duty fully and strictly. He would maintain their grounds; and he thought no gentleman could withhold his assent to all, or deny any one of them to be true.

First. He would say the House had referred, in express terms, the whole matter to the committee, and had authorized and required them to investigate the evidence and the question of privilege, and to do all they had done.

Second. That the committee had acted in perfect conformity to every precedent set in either branch of Congress, from the commencement down to this time.

Lastly, the committee had done no more than submit propositions to the House, for its final action; after submitting the whole evidence and arguments, to be considered by the House as the House might deem fit.

A mass of memorials had been presented to the House, praying an investigation into this matter, and charging these individuals, members of the House, and praying that they might be expelled from this body; not only mentioning and describing the members, but mentioning them by name. Those memorials were referred, and the committee was ordered to inquire into the subject matter of the memorials, and report upon the prayer contained in them; and they were authorized to send for persons and papers, and to inquire into the question of privilege. The original resolution had given them that authority for the express purpose of inquiry into the question of privilege; and if members were to be named, and were named in the very documents referred to the committee, he would ask the gentleman, who was still the great champion of the right of petition, whether, if such documents referred to a particular act, and named the parties, if authority would not be granted to inquire into all the facts relating to the prayer of the memorials, and report whether that prayer should be granted or not? No man who was versed in parliamentary usage, he thought, could entertain a shadow of doubt that the committee would be authorized to inquire and report whether the prayer should be granted or refused, and also to inquire into the question of privilege. Notwithstanding some threats which had been thrown out that the committee would find it necessary to be armed, they had done their duty fully and faithfully, and trusted they would be sustained.

Mr. WISE begged to ask the chairman, as he had alluded to threats, whether he [Mr. W.] had at any time made any intimation or offer of violence to the committee at any time, and he would beg him to state in direct terms.

Mr. TOUCEY said he would answer.

The SPEAKER said he would say, in advance, that it was not in order to go into any occurrence out of the House.

Mr. TOUCEY said he trusted no gentleman would object to his giving an answer.

Mr. WISE said he should not have asked the question, but the chairman had been allowed to make the general remark, and he hoped, that in justice to him [Mr. W.] he would be permitted to answer.

Mr. TOUCEY said he would not refuse to answer. He did not refer, however, to any thing which had occurred out of the House, but to a remark in a public debate, which he had not heard with pleasure, but which did not leave it at his option to decline serving on the committee. In justice to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] he would say that his conduct to the committee was decorous and proper, and courteous in the highest degree; and, to his knowledge, no member of the committee had the slightest objection to that gentleman's deportment.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON made an explanation of a former remark made by him, which was alluded to by Mr. TOUCEY.

Mr. GRAVES said the reply of the chairman to the inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia had been confined to him alone, leaving the inference that some threat might have been used by him [Mr. G.] or some other person. He would beg the chairman to state whether he was implicated in the intimation.

Mr. TOUCEY had not made the reply broader, beeause the question was not broader. If any implication arises from his remark, he would give to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] the same answer as he had given to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE.]

Mr. T. then said that the House, knowing the transaction to be investigated, and knowing that members, and members only, were implicated; having made it the subject of debate in the House; and having clothed the committee with full powers to prosecute an inquiry, the committee had done their duty. Now if the House should turn round, and tell the committee they had exceeded their duty, after having charged them with so delicate and responsible a duty, he should acquiesce, but he would protest that it would be done in defiance of every principle of justice and Parliamentary practice. He concluded by referring to, and commenting upon, several cases of breach of privilege in Congress, to show that they sustained the course of proceeding in this case.

Mr. T. had adduced these cases to show that the present committee had been guided throughout by precedents, many of which, however, went much farther than they did, for every opportunity had been afforded to the parties implicated to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to call others, etc.

Mr. WISE said neither himself, Mr. GRAVES, nor Mr. JONES, had ever, he believed, received any notice that the committee was to pass a judgment, and recommend a sentence upon them.

Mr. TOUCEY replied that it was a total misconception to say that the committee had tried any body, or adjudicated. They had neither done so, nor intended to do so. They had merely reported a resolution, a resolution that every member of the House could have moved. The present question, however, was whether this testimony should be suppressed, or not. The motion to print, and postpone, was by the unanimous direction of the committee.

Mr. ELMORE had assented to the postponement in the committee; but the objections he had heard to that proposition in the House had struck him with much force, and he should prefer the motion referred to by Mr. ADAMS, [to recommit, and strike out the report, and the facts]

Mr. GRENNEL had readily concurred in the motion to postpone in the committee, which was made, not by himself, but in consequence of a suggestion he made, and he should support that motion now if it was put, as well as the motion to print. But, in doing so, his course was not to be considered as a departure from the ground occupied by Mr. RARIDEN and himself in opposition to the report of the majority.

Some short conversation then took place as to the omission of a vote upon the journal of the committee, between Messrs. RARIDEN, TOUCEY, and WISE, which appeared to be a clerical omission, and Mr. TOUCEY stated that he would correct it.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a desire that the report of the majority should be signed.

Mr. GRANTLAND said, for one, he would take great pleasure in signing it.

Mr. ROBERTSON again contended that the mode of procedure by the committee had been irregular, and cited the British practice in support of his positton. The committee, he insisted, should have stopped the moment it was disclosed, that a member of the House was implicated, for they could not proceed in any investigation which should affect a member's privileges. He denied that the reference of the memorials, naming the members implicated, authorized the committee to proceed as they had done. After proceeding for some time, Mr. R. gave way to

Mr. MENEFEE, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, April 27, 1838.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Alabama, recommending the annexation of West Florida to that State, asked to be discharged from further consideration of the subject: agreed to.

Mr. G. from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of James Cox, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject: agreed to.

Mr. G. from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution of inquiry as to the expediency of a new judicial district in Louisiana: agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TROTTER, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of a new post route from Manchester, through various towns, to Greensborough, in Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the same committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of a new post route from Williams's Ferry, in Illinois, to a certain town in Indiana.

The bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Elisha Eldridge; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LYON presented a petition for the establishment of a post route from Jacksonburg, in the county of Jackson, by way of South Jackson and Montgomery, to Gambleville, in the county of Hillsdale, in the State of Michigan: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas was taken up.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, expressed a desire to have the consideration of the bill postponed for a short time, that he might have an opportunity of giving it a sufficient examination.

Mr. WHITE made some observations deprecating the farther postponement, and advocating the expediency and necessity of the measure.

Mr. NORVELL objected to that part of the bill (the 8th section) which provides for allowing the confederated tribes to elect a delegate to represent them at the seat of Government during the sessions of Congress; and he objected particularly to the reasons assigned in the preamble to that section for allowing them to elect a delegate, as the same argument might be used hereafter in favor of a negro delegate. He never wished to see the day in this country in which an Indian or a negro would have a seat on the floor of either House of Congress. He cheerfully agreed with the friends of the bill, tha it was incumbent on us to do all that was in ou power to ameliorate the condition of this unfortunate people; and he thought the bill well calculated to effect the objects for which it was intended. But he did not think the 8th section necessary; and as it introduced a new and dangerous principle, he would move to strike it out.

Mr. LINN said the gentleman from Michigan was mistaken in supposing that it was intended that the Indian delegate should have a seat on the floor of the House of Representatives. The delegate was to reside at the seat of Government during the sessions of Congress, to attend to the affairs of his people generally, and to give such information to Congress as would enable it to be better acquainted with their condition, and to legislate with more certainty and effect with regard to them. One of the objects of the bill was to elevate the Indian character, and to give them respect for, and confidence in, themselves; and the most effectual way of doing so would be to give them the incentive of honorable office; and the committee thought it important that such incentives should be held out to the ambitious and enterprising of this people, instead of the ambition they now have to become warlike chiefs. The bill was, in his opinion, the most effectual measure that could be devised for the security of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, on the borders of which such numbers of these Indians had been thrown, and also the only feasible plan of saving these unfortunates from utter destruction. They had been crowded back by the white population until they could go no further west, and now was the accepted time for the philanthropist to step forward and preserve them. As the State of Missouri had been alluded to, Mr. L. read several passages from the memorial of the Legislature of Missouri on the subject, in which the policy embraced in the bill was strongly urged.

Mr. LUMPKIN urged the Senate to proceed at once to the consideration of the measure, which he looked upon to be the best that could be devised, not only for the protection and security of the frontier States of Missouri and Arkansas, but of the Indians themselves, and as eminently calculated to elevate and improve their condition. The objects embraced in this bill, Mr. L. said, were not new.—The subject had been before Congress from the days of General Washington to the present time; and by a reference to the public documents it would be seen that Mr. Jefferson, and all of his successors, had viewed it as worthy of the most favorable consideration of Congress.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. L. adverted to the two able reports made on the subject by Mr. Monroe and by Mr. Calhoun, and said that the subject had been discussed until it would seem that it was not only familiar to every member of Congress, but to the whole reading portion of the community. If this, he said, were not enough, the information presented during this session, and the able speech of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. TIPTON,] so replete with information and detail, would be sufficient to call the special attention of every Senator to the subject. Mr. L. said he would not now attempt to enter into an argument in defence of the bill; for he concurred with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that this would be unnecessary, unless some more plausible objections should be urged against it than had yet been heard. Should it become necessary, he was confident that the friends of the bill would be fully able to answer any objections that might be made to it, and he himself would cheerfully contribute his mite.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, said he had determined, after the remarks of the chairman of the committee, not to ask a further delay. He was seldom unprepared on any subject, but, owing to peculiar circumstances, he had not been able to give a particular examination to this bill until his attention was called to the subject yesterday by the remonstrance of the Choctaw and Creek delegation which he had presented. As to the objections made by these delegations, he was now satisfied that they had no foundation, and that they had no right to interfere, as no tribe would become part of this confederacy without their express consent. Mr. C. in corroboration of this, quoted the two provisions of the bill applicable to the case. With regard to the objection of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] he differed with him entirely; and he thought that the section ought to be preserved both on account of economy and of good faith. The provision objected to, was better than the present mode of treating with the Indians, by which delegations of the various tribes were frequently permitted to come to the seat of Government at the expense of the United States. One of the inducements held out to the Southwest Indians when they agreed to remove to the west of the Mississippi, was that they would be allowed to have a delegate at the seat of Government. Mr. C. was truly anxious to get rid of the Indians that were in the old States. They are, said he, in our way, and, in fact, they are in their own way, by remaining where they are. Mr. C. said that he would not persist in his motion for a postponement, though he would rather have had more time allowed him for consideration.

Mr. NORVELL here modified his amendment by striking out the provision in the eighth section for a delegate of Indian descent to reside at the seat of Government during the sessions of Congress, and to insert agent instead; and to strike out the words "with the same compensation as that of a member of Congress;" and also to strike out the preamble to the section in the following words:

"SEC. 8. And to promote the advancement of such confederated tribes in the science of civil government, to afford them a convincing proof of the desire of the United States that they may be secured the enjoyment of the benefit of free government, and to enable them at all times to represent their condition to the Government."

The object of this amendment was to allow the tribes an "agent," instead of a "delegate," as in the bill, and to leave the compensation to be settled hereafter. He wished also to strike out the preamble, because it contained precisely the words by which the attempt to establish a free negro representation in the United States might be urged. He was not opposed to the bill, Mr. N. said, but to this section.

Mr. ALLEN threw out some objections to the principles involved in the bill, with a view of eliciting inquiry, and an answer to them from some gentlemen better acquainted with the subject, than he professed to be. This Government had always acted towards the Indians under the treaty making power, treating them as communities, but now it was proposed to act towards them in a legislative capacity, treating them as individuals. He wished to understand whether they had this power. He wished also to be more enlightened as to the policy of organizing a community on the borders of two of our most exposed frontier States, and by the power of this Government, giving strength and energy to a confederacy of people who are by nature the implacable enemies of the white race. These were the scruples which he entertained, and unless they could be removed, he must vote against the bill.

Mr. WHITE said that provided he could get the benefit of having an agent to be sent here by this confederation, he did not care about the name that was to be given him. The name of agent would answer as well as that of delegate. Old as he was, he hoped to live to see the day when the Aborigines of this country would be sufficiently enlightened to have their delegate on the floor of Congress to advocate their interests. Mr. W. spoke of the advantages that would result from holding out this incentive to the honorable ambition of the Indians, and said that if he had had his way at the commencement of Gen. Jackson's administration, he would, instead of selecting broken down politicians for our Indian agents, have appointed to those stations men of Indian descent; and he knew many such who were highly moral and intellectual men, every way qualified to figure in either House of Congress. Mr. W. replied at length to Mr. ALLEN in defence of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he did not intend, when he came to the Senate in the morning, to participate in the debate. After the very able exposition of the details of the bill, as well as of the policy of the proposed measure of his colleague, [Mr. TIPTON,] and the chairman of the committee, [Mr. WHITE,] he had felt that duty had no other demands upon him than a silent vote in favor of the bill, and he should certainly, at this time, occupy very little time in submitting some remarks, induced entirely by the observations of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] He had heard that Senator with equal surprise and regret: surprise that such sentiments as he had expressed were entertained by any one here, and regret that they had come from a Western Senator. Mr. S. said he could not consent to suffer the remarks of that Senator to go to the world without raising his voice against them. What, sir, were the grounds assumed by that Senator? That the white man and the Indian were natural enemies; that the bill proposed an increase of the energies, and an organization of the forces, of our enemies; that the lands upon which we had located these Indians might be at some time wanted by our own people. Yes, sir, the Senator had assumed the broad ground that the white man and the Indian are by nature enemies to each other.

[Here Mr. ALLEN rose and said, that he had no particular allusion to any vindictive or hostile feeling existing personally between them.]

Mr. S. said he had no disposition to misunderstand any Senator, nor could he believe that he had misconceived the Senator from Ohio; for, sir, it is not to be disguised that a large portion of the argument of that Senator was based upon a supposed danger that was to be apprehended from a concentration of those tribes on the borders of the frontier States, and it was repeatedly said that they were our natural enemies, and only wanted concentration and organization to bring down their vengeance upon us.

[Here Mr. ALLEN again arose and affirmed what he had before said.]

Mr. S. resumed. He had no objection, he said, to be interrupted by any Senator who might suppose that he had been misconstrued, but he thought the Senator from Ohio had carried the principle beyond its legitimate purpose, by rising to explain when he had been correctly quoted. But let that pass. The Senator admits that he is now understood in the sense he desires to be.

Shall it be proclaimed to the world from this hall, Mr. President, that the white and the red man are natural enemies to each other? Shall it told, will it be believed, at this day, that the God of Nature has implanted into the breast of the white man and the Indian feelings of personal hostility that shall prove the destruction of either race? Shall the aborigines of the nation be told from this hall, that we believe them to be our enemies, and have no confidence in them? Shall it be proclaimed to them that we are their enemies—that Nature's God has erected an impassible barrier between them and us? Shall we create distrust and alarm in the minds of those Indians who have sought our protection, and who rely implicitly on our friendship? The doctrines advanced by the Senator from Ohio are the same that have drenched our country with blood; the same that have produced the extinction of so large a number of the Indian race; the same that have caused the massacre of our helpless women and children; the same that were preached by Oceola, Sam Jones, Jumper, and Wild Cat, and others, to the misguided Seminoles; the same that have driven the Southern Indians into despair; the same that have caused the best blood of the nation to be poured out, and the means of the Treasury to be almost exhausted, in a vain attempt to drive that mistaken and deluded people from their native swamps, glades, and hammocks. Impressed with the idea that the white man is only seeking his destruction, the Indian resolves on selling his life as dearly as possible; and if he must fall, to die bravely defending the land of his fathers. But, sir, how stands the case? Are the Indian and the white man natural enemies? Can this be maintained? Let the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth, the reception of our forefathers at Jamestown, answer the question. Let the story of a Pocahontas, and a thousand other similar occurrences, answer the question Let the history of the illustrious William Penn and his associates answer the question. No, sir, they are not natural enemies; but by a series of oppressions, of gross injustice, we have, by our own acts, created enmity between us and a portion of the Indians. They met us at the shores of the Atlantic, extended to us the hand of friendship, and smoked with us the pipe of peace. Our numbers increased. We wanted their lands. We pressed upon them. They retreated back, and surrendered the shores of the mighty waters, but still they were not at rest; we followed close upon them. From time to time they made temporary stands, but all was vain; they had no home, no resting place. They have retreated from forest to forest, from river to river, from mountain to mountain. The towering Alleghany, the rapid Ohio, and the majestic Mississippi, have been passed in succession, and the remnant of those once powerful nations which concluded the treaty of amity, peace, and friendship, at Philadelphia, under the celebrated elm tree, with the illustrious Penn, has at last found a resting place beyond the Mississippi, in the contemplated Territory. Then, sir, is it not possible, that if the Indian is our enemy, it is not a natural enmity, but a feeling produced by our own acts, like that which prompted the noble Logan. He was not our enemy; he was the friend of the white man. But Logan was human. If you expect the friendship of man, you must reciprocate his kind deeds in good faith. Friendship is a social attribute: cherished and reciprocated, it lives and flourishes; abused and neglected, it languishes and dies, or becomes the exciting cause of temporary hatred or deep-rooted malice. The lessons taught the world by the great and good Penn and his associates, in their intercourse with the Indians, should never be forgotten. Without carnal weapons, he met, he subdued, he conquered. By acts of personal kindness, he proved the truth of his doctrines, and the savage bowed in humble adoration. And such was the great influence that he acquired over them, that, to this day, himself and the society of which he was a member, are held in almost sacred reverence by their descendants. What, then, Mr. President, is the language we should hold on this subject? Should it be the proclamation of the Senator from Ohio—enmity, enmity, natural enmity, between ourselves and the Indians? Or should it not rather be peace, friendship, good will, protection, encouragement, and safety, to the remnant of this unfortunate people?

The Senator seems to apprehend great danger to the States bordering on the Indian Territory, if the bill becomes a law. Mr. S. thought it was an unnecessary alarm. The whole number of Indians east of the Rocky Mountains is only about 330,000, including men, women, and children; and the number proposed to be organized in the Territory could not exceed 130,000, a mere handfull compared to the white population in the immediate adjoining States. Can it be supposed for a moment, that these Indians, after having exchanged their lands at our request, and removed to this country; and after having received patents for their lands, and a Government from our wisdom, with a full knowledge of our power, would be willing to throw away all these benefits, to surrender all these advantages, and rush madly on to their own destruction—for such must be the inevitable consequence, should they go to war with this powerful nation. They would be much more likely to hail you as friends, as saviors of the little remnants of their once powerful nations. They have had wars until their hearts have become sick; till their most powerful nations have dwindled down to little tribes; till their greatest kings are reduced to chiefs of miserable bands. They do not war, they want peace, they need repose. It is a question with them, not of victory or defeat, but of life and death, of preservation or destruction, and well do they know it. Senators need not feel alarmed at imaginary dangers: there is no danger to be apprehended from that source. There is much more danger of hostilities from and amongst the separate bands than there could possibly be from this confederation when they were organized, and were brought into a close alliance with the Government, receiving the counsel and advice of the superintendent, and of their delegate here. The bill is ample in its details, and he had no doubt but that it would produce results if carried into effect, satisfactory to those who desire to see the remnant of this once powerful people not only preserved, but advancing in civilization, while it must prove highly satisfactory to those who wish to see this Government pursue a course of policy towards this unfortunate people, becoming an enlightened, high minded, honorable and philanthropic nation.

Mr. S. said he had some ten years ago, while a member of the other branch of Congress, served on the Committee on Indian Affairs, with his friend the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. LUMPKIN,] and he would congratulate that Senator on the strong probability that the policy which that committee at that time advocated, would ultimately prevail. The question then presented itself to the committee as one of preservation or destruction of the whole race. It was believed then that the Indians could not exist in the midst of, and surrounded by the whites. It was believed then that it was due to the States, and in accordance with the highest considerations of humanity, that the Indians should be removed west of the Mississippi, beyond the the limits of the States and Territories, where they could rest in safety, on lands secured to themselves and their posterity for ever. The last four Administrations recommended this policy; however much they differed as to other measures, in this they all concurred. The Indians consented to it; they examined the country, and pronounced it good, and they have removed to it. The question now is, shall we carry out in good faith our policy; shall we give them that aid and protection in their new homes, which we promised them; shall we encircle them with our paternal arms; or shall we withdraw our countenance, seek pretexts to involve them in difficulties, that we may hasten their extinction? Shall we still press upon them, until we drive them beyond the Rocky Mountains, until we hear the sound of the last groan of the Indian die on the Pacific? Let justice, let humanity, let our national honor answer these questions.

The clause of the bill that requires patents to issue to the lands set apart for the different tribes, is one of great importance: they should be assured that their title will be indefeasible. There can be little doubt but that it has been greatly owing to the uncertainty of the tenure by which the semi-civilized Indian held his land, that his permanent improvements have been greatly retarded. Few men will sow when they are doubtful who may reap; but, by giving them a title upon which they can rely, they will be stimulated to cultivate and improve their lands with a prospect of making them their permanent homes.

Senators have doubted the power of this Government to extend the principles of the bill over the Indians. Mr. S. could not perceive the objection, as the bill stands. If any could have existed, it was entirely removed by the consideration that it was not proposed to include any tribe in the confederation that did not voluntarily become a party to it. Consequently, there could be no objection to it, as it was a voluntary compact of all parties concerned.

The clause of the bill giving power to the confederation to elect an Indian delegate, to reside at Washington during the session of Congress, had been objected to, but he had not felt the force of the objection. He thought it a very valuable provision. It would tend greatly to elevate the Indian character, and to inspire confidence in the good intentions of our Government; and at the same time a delegate from their own people, in whom they had confidence, located at the seat of Government during the sessions, would add much to the facilities of transacting the necessary business of the Territory.

Mr. S. did not propose to pursue the examination of the various provisions of the bill. He thought that had been sufficiently done by others. He did not rise to make a speech, but merely to answer, on the spur of the occasion, doctrines that he thought unsound, and calculated to produce at this time a deleterious effect on the policy of the Government, and our relations with the Indians.

Mr. S. said he felt disposed to notice one other position of the Senator before he took his seat. The Senator seems to deprecate the passage of this bill, lest the lands occupied by the Indians, under its provisions, should at some period of time be wanted by the whites for their own use.

This view of the case is well calculated to arouse all the feelings of sympathy, humanity, and philanthropy of our nature. What, sir! is it possible that there are those at this day who would withhold even this little spot of earth from those who were once the undisputed owners of the soil of this whole nation? On this little spot of land situated beyond the Mississippi, beyond all the States and Territories, approximating to the Rocky mountains, even there the Indian is to be viewed as an intruder; he is to be driven still further west. Where does the Senator propose to locate him? Where is he to find a home, a resting place? This side of the rocky mountains? No; he will be in our way; he will be too near to the whites; they may want the lands, says the Senator. The west side of those mountains? No, not there! white settlements have been commenced on the Columbia river, and the whites want the lands. Where, then? where, Mr. President, but beneath the dark waves of the Pacific, shall the Indian find a resting place? Humanity shudders at the thought, and all the sympathies of our nature, as well as our national character, forbid the idea. We cannot recall the past; but let us atone as far as possible for our past policy, by carrying out in good faith the provisions of this bill. Prove to the Indian that we are his friend, and not his enemy, and he will reciprocate our kindness, and bless our exertions to save him from impending destruction.

After some remarks from Messrs. SWIFT, DAVIS, LINN, and NILES, the question was taken on Mr. NORVELL's amendment, and it was rejected—yeas 16, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alaba, Hubbard, King, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut, Trotter, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tipton, White, and Williams—24.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend the bill by striking out the preamble in the eighth section; which motion was negatived without a division.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the bill was amended by giving the new Territory the name of "Neosho," [the Osage name for Grand river.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to amend the bill by striking out the provision allowing to the members of the Indian council their necessary subsistence, and giving them two dollars per day in lieu thereof, and made a few observations in support of this amendment; but withdrew the proposition after some remarks from Messrs. NILES and WHITE in opposition to it.

Mr. KING expressed himself as anxious to do any thing within the power of Congress to ameliorate the condition of the Indian race, and to civilize and elevate them; and he was prepared to look at this measure without reference to the future consequences adverted to by the Senator from Ohio. But while he looked at the condition of these tribes sent across the Mississippi, and believed that good policy, humanity, and the best interests of the Indians, demanded some measure like the present, he was for looking, at the same time, at the condition of the frontier States on whose borders they were thrown, and for providing, in the most effectual manner, for their protection. He believed that the bill itself would have some effect in that way, but he wished to provide against an increase of the evils it was sought to remedy. It had been supposed that the country laid off for this Territory [here Mr. K. described its bounds] was sufficiently large for their subsistence; but would they not, he asked, be acting as prudent men by putting out of the Government to throw any more tribes within these circumscribed limits, where they would not be able to live by agricultural pursuits, and must, therefore, press on the whites, or starve? He was disposed to stop where we were; he was not disposed to push the Indians on to the Rocky mountains, or crowd them in these circumscribed limits to starve. It was not his design to detain the Senate. They would see his object in the amendment he was about to offer.

Mr. K. then offered an amendment, in substance as follows: That all that portion of country belonging to the United States, to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, which lies east of the Rocky mountains, north of the Missouri river, and west of the Mississippi river, shall constitute an Indian Territory; and the faith of the United States is hereby pledged, that such part of such Indian Territory as has been, and shall be, granted to Indian tribes, shall be secured to them and to their descendants.

This amendment leaves out, Mr. K. said, all that portion of Indian country to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and reserves this country for the northern Indians, and declares that while we have reserved the country bordering on Missouri and Arkansas for the southern Indians, no others shall be sent there; and that this country described in the amendment is to be reserved for the northern Indians, when they can be removed there. He hoped the Senate would see the propriety of adopting this amendment, for it behooved us, while we are providing for the security and protection of these unfortunate people, not to lose sight of the safety and welfare of our own people.

Mr. NORVELL was glad to find that one portion of the bill did not strike at the feelings of the Southern Senators; and but for the State of Arkansas, he would move to set apart all the territory west of the Mississippi for the Indians, to constitute a galaxy of Indian States.

Mr. Sevier warmly advocated the amendment at some length; and

After some further remarks from Mr. KING, and from Messrs. LINN and TIPTON in opposition to it,

The Senate adjourned over to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, April 28, 1838.

The Hon. EDWARD ROBINSON, member elect from the State of Maine, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. EVANS, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, and on fortifying the frontier: the former were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having charge of the bill on the subject; and the latter to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NOYES, on leave, also presented certain joint resolutions of the same Legislature, on the subject of colonial trade, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the "bill from the Senate to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States," was taken up, read twice, and, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CUSHMAN, of New Hampshire, and Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, severally, on leave, presented petitions for the establishment of post routes.

Mr. EWING, on leave, presented some papers in relation to the claim of Matthew Steward, which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HAMMOND presented the proceedings of a meeting, and a memorial, from citizens of Lycoming county, Pa. recommending Lockhaven in said county, as a suitable site for the establishment of a National Foundry: referred to the select committee on that subject.

THE LATE DUEL.

The House then resumed the unfinished business, being the report of the select committee appointed to investigate into the causes which led to the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY; the question being on printing and postponing it till Monday week.

Mr. ROBERTSON continued his remarks in opposition to the course the committee had taken in directing or recommending the action of the House; insisting that the irregularity vitiated the whole proceeding, and that the whole should be recommitted. He adverted to the publication of the report in the Globe; which, if not a breach of the privileges of the House, was, he said, indelicate, and highly reprehensible, as was also the extract published in that print from another paper, (the Philadelphia Ledger, we believe,) appealing strongly to the passions of the House. Mr. R. went at large into the argument to prove the irregularity of the proceedings of the committee, and reviewed the precedents cited by Mr. TOUCEY. He disclaimed imputing any design or motive on the part of the committee, in making a labored commentary upon the evidence, but spoke of its effect and tendency as doing injustice to the parties implicated, for it prejudged them, and found a verdict of guilty, without bringing forward a single particle of justification or extenuation. Hence he objected to the printing of the report, and also to its reception, for though not a final sentence, yet it went to prescribe a punishment, a torture upon the feelings, an outrage upon the rights, and a degradation upon the character of individuals, and those individuals members of the House. Mr. R. reprehended the course of Mr. FAIRFIELD in originally bringing forward the resolution, and said the only course the House should now take would be to retrace their steps, send back the report to the committee, with instructions to undo all that had been done.

Mr. STANLEY denied that the petitions sent to the select committee were in the nature of instructions, and put the case of anti-slavery petitions being sent to a committee, praying for the abolition of slave commerce between the States, the resolution of Mr. PATTON being rescinded, whether Southern members would approve a bill being reported in consequence thereof. This he considered a case in point. Mr. S. also replied to Mr. TURNEY and Mr. TOUCEY, and condemned the warm language of the latter, particularly in referring to the deed in sepulchral tones, as that of a man "embruing his hand in his brother's blood." This alone showed that the gentleman had exhibited a warmth of feeling that militated against his impartiality as a judge. The committee, Mr. S. designated as a "packed jury," with previously formed opinions, and they had no right to try the gentlemen they had arraigned before them.

Mr. NAYLOR also opposed the motion of the committee to print and postpone, and expressed himself in favor of the motion indicated by Mr. ADAMS to recommit. He was opposed to the course recommended by the committee upon two grounds: first, that he believed the committee had violated, he did not say intentionally, but still violated, the Constitution and laws of the land; and, secondly, they had done first wrongfully an act of commission, and then secondly they had omitted to do what the rules of the House required they should do. These grounds he sustained by insisting that the resolution did not give the committee the power to investigate the conduct of members of the House, because they were not named therein; and yet the committee had virtually tried and condemned those gentlemen; and, in the next place, their mode of proceeding conflicted with the oft-cited rule of Jefferson's Manual. All that they were authorized to do was to report the fact to the House that a member or members were implicated. Moreover, even in the course they had pursued, they had only tried a portion of the members implicated, for he would defy any man to discriminate as to the guilt of the other parties who were also involved.

As to the printing of the report, it was now become a matter of secondary importance; for, before it was known to the House, it was printed and circulated from one end of the country to the other. He was not so much opposed to the printing, however, as he was in favor of the motion of Mr. ADAMS to recommit; for, as the report was already printed, the printing by the House could have little effect one way or other.

Mr. BRONSON said, that if he did not know the question now before the House, he should suppose that the merits of the whole question were under discussion. He thought the debate had taken altogether too wide a range. He understood the motion to be to postpone for a few days, and print the report; and that the question would be divided, so as to take the vote separately upon each proposition. In regard to the postponement, he knew of no very prominent objections; but he thought the wishes of those persons involved should be consulted, and he would be in a great measure willing to be governed by their desire. In regard to the question of printing, he was not satisfied by the arguments of those who were opposed to it. He did not consider the question, whether the members involved should be put on trial, at all connected with the mere question of printing; but it seemed that the whole matter had been changed, and that the committee were now on trial. It was reduced to a question whether the report of a committee, appointed by an order of the House, should be thrown out of doors. He contended at length that the true construction of the order compelled the committee to report; and that the reference of the memorials strengthened that construction. The House had full knowledge of these facts, that certain members were implicated, not only before the passage of the order, but also from the memorials; and the House knew all the time that the committee was engaged in an investigation of the conduct of members of this House. It was, therefore, unnecessary, and would have been a mere matter of form, for the committee to have come in with a report stating nothing more than a fact already well known, and legally upon the records of the House. In fact, the committee was on trial, and to suppress their report would be to cast censure upon them, as it would be withholding from them the ordinary courtesy due to a committee of the House. It was conceded that the printing could now make no difference, for the report had been printed, and was now circulated all over the country; but it was important that a committee who had done, as they said, their duty faithfully, should not be subjected to censure; and it was really a question whether the course of the committee should be sanctioned or condemned. He contended, that the committee had kept strictly within the line of their duty; that they were bound to report something; and had done no more than the order of the House demanded of them; and he was desirous that they should not be treated with disrespect.

Mr. TOUCEY made a proposition to correct an omission in the journal, alluded to yesterday, which was not received.

Some few remarks of a personal character passed between Mr. TOUCEY and Mr. STANLEY.

Mr. WISE asked of the chairman whether any alteration, verbal or in substance, had been made by the other members of the committee in Mr. POTTER's absence, and since he had seen it.

Mr. TOUCEY replied that the committee met on Thursday, and agreed upon suggestions to be embodied in the report, and adjourned to meet on Saturday. The report was shown to Mr. POTTER on Friday night, as he wished to leave the city; and he approved of it fully. On Saturday morning the committee met and discussed the report; and some alterations, merely verbal, and not altering the meaning, were then made.

Mr. WISE then remarked that the fact was admitted. That was a report nearly touching his character; and character especially depended on a word. He would demand, that in a report affecting his character, it should be in every word, letter, and in punctuation—for in punctuation there is sense and substance—precisely as it was sanctioned by the committee, consisting of a majority of them; and he protested against the alteration of that report, even to the crossing of a t, or the dotting of an i by the other members, in the absence of Mr. POTTER; and he wished to know if the House, under such circumstances, would sanction the report?

Mr. BOON said he had sat patiently and heard such a general denunciation against the majority of this committee, that he become impatient. Gentlemen who had denounced the majority, all assumed for themselves to be the exclusive judges of the Constitution and a little work called Jefferson's Manual. Why, Mr. B. understood the Constitution to be as broad as the United States, and susceptible of as many constructions as there were individuals within it capable of construing for themselves; and he addressed himself more particularly to the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. NAYLOR,] who was so very explicit upon the subject of the Constitution. Mr. B. had no doubt that that gentleman had fully satisfied himself that his construction of it was perfectly correct, and that the construction by others was worth nothing; but it worked no conviction upon his [Mr. B's] mind, for he felt himself left precisely where he was, when gentleman was done speaking, as he was when the gentleman began. They might as well read from the "Pottawattomie Psalm Book" to Mr. B. as to read from "Jefferson's Manual," when questions of common sense and stern justice came up for consideration. Their hair-splittings and cobweb distinctions should never direct him in his course there nor elsewhere.

When the proper time arrived—he should not do as others had done, go into it now—but when the proper time arrived, Mr. B. said he should be prepared to express himself openly and fearlessly upon the merits of the question, and would stop at no half-way house. But, for the present, he had only to say to those gentlemen who construed the Constitution for themselves, that they must not tell him, because he construed it differently, that he had trampled it under foot.

Mr. HOWARD announced his intention to call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolutions, and then went into an argument, at length, in reply to some arguments that had been used in debate.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose to appeal to the members of the House of every party. He remarked that it was perfectly evident that if this trial was to go on, the public business must be indefinitely postponed. A whole week had been consumed upon a mere preliminary question, and, unless the House should come to a decision upon it to-day, he should feel compelled to move a suspension of the rules on Monday morning, to allow the House to proceed with the public business.

Mr. MENEFEE commented with severity upon the injustice of proceeding thus far in a proceeding making an assault upon the character of members, and then to cut short all opportunity for exculpation. If there had been time for accusation, there must be time, also, for justification. He intimated that friends of the Administration in the House had taken this case up as an exception to the general manner in which duels had been looked upon heretofore, and for party purposes; and whatever delay or loss of time may be occasioned, or whatever obstructions to the public business, the responsibility must rest upon those members who had introduced the proceeding, and who had carried it to a point, the most improper of all others to stop at. The trial must proceed until it is finished. The House might, he said, get rid of it, but it must be in a constitutional way, and consistently with the rights of the accused.

Mr. M. then went on to argue upon the motion before the House, and supported the proposition to commit the subject to a committee on privileges, as the best way to bring the House to a speedy and correct decision.

Mr. BELL, at this stage, moved an adjournment.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 76, nays 96.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. MALLORY moved a call of the House.

Mr. JENIFER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. POTTS then moved an adjournment; which prevailed—ayes 92, noes 75; and so

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, April 30, 1838.

Mr. KENNEDY, member elect from the State of Maryland, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. M. MORRIS of Pennsylvania, on leave granted, presented two petitions, signed by citizens of Pennsylvnnia and New Jersey, one of them by 57 and the other by 49 persons, praying that an act of Congress may be passed establishing a mail route from Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, by the way of Frankford, Foxehase, Huntingdon, Sorrel Horse, Davisville, Springville, Richboro, Newtown, Doliugton, and Taylorsville, to Pennington, New Jersey.

Mr. HENRY presented the petition of a number of citizens of the county of Mercer, for a post route from the town of Mercer, on the road to Scrubgrass, to the cross-road that leads from Butler to Franklin: on motion, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRIDSALL, on leave, presented the memorial of Matthew Dorr, of Sparta, Livingston county, New York, praying a pension for Revolutionary services: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. DAVEE, on leave, presented the petition of Silas Hale for additional allowance as mail-carrier on post route No. 92, State of Maine; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Messrs. TOLAND, MAURY, and HAWKINS, also, on leave, presented petitions.

STEAM EXPLOSIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts called the attention of the House to a very important bill that he considered peculiarly demanded their consideration, viz: the "bill to authorize the appointment of persons to test the usefulness of inventions to improve and render safe the boilers of steam-engines against explosions;" and he expressed a hope that the Committee on Commerce, or some member of it, would ask the consent of the House to take it up at this time.

Mr. CUSHMAN joined in the wish, and hoped the House would yield its unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, inquired if there was not a bill on the same subject reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CUSHMAN replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITTLESEY suggested that both bills be included in the motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he must object, for there was other and far more pressing business that wanted action.

Mr. CALHOUN moved a suspension of the rules; but the motion was rejected.

Mr. WHITTLESEY suggested that, as several gentlemen were desirous to present petitions, that the rules be suspended for that purpose; but it was not assented to.

On motion of Mr. GLASCOCK,

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting the appointment of Librarian in this House, and of uniting the office with that of the Keeper of Public Documents.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House copies of all correspondence and communications which have passed between this and any foreign Government, and the officers or agents thereof, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States; also, what steps, if any, have been taken to prevent the introduction of such paupers into the United States; provided such communication is not incompatible with the interest of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER of Ohio, asked the consent of the House to offer the following, but objection was made to it:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-arms furnish to this House a statement of the amount of specie and specie checks paid to each member of Congress during the extra session.

Resolved, That the Secretary of war be directed to lay before this House the report and survey of the harbor of Sandusky, made by Lieut. Campbell Graham, in the year 1826.

THE LATE DUEL.

The House then resumed the unfinished business, being the report of the committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of Mr. CILLEY, on the motion made by Mr. TOUCEY, under the unanimous direction of the committee to print and postpone till Monday next.

The question pending, was the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON to recommit the report to a committee to be denominated a committee on privileges.

Mr. MENEFEE concluded his remarks in opposition to the report, and the propriety of printing or acting upon it, upon the ground that the committee had transcended their powers.

Mr. PICKENS then obtained the floor, and stated that he had voted for the original proposition of the the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FAIRFIELD,] because it related to one of his colleagues, and he should have voted in the same way had any other gentleman been similarly situated. But, considering the state of the public business, and the many important, deeply important, questions, not only to the House, but to the country at large, which were held in suspense; and considering, also, that he was utterly opposed to any resolutions upon this subject, Mr. P. felt bound, under existing circumstances, to move to lay the whole matter on the table. In doing so, he premised that no solicitation, from any quarter, should induce him to withdraw it. Mr. P. then moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. GRAVES did trust that the gentleman from South Carolina would not thus close this debate, but allow him an opportunity of defending himself.

Mr. WISE begged leave to address his most earnest request to the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw that motion. Not only did he appeal to the gentleman as his friend, but as a member of the House. Against such a decision he entered his solemn protest.

Mr. PICKENS would accede with great pleasure, but he could not consistently with his public duty.

Mr. PETRIKIN and Mr. CUSHING simultaneously rose and moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in till 198 members were found to be present; when, on motion of Mr. LEGARE, it was dispensed with.

The question then recurring on the motion to lay on the table—

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana inquired of the CHAIR whether, if this motion prevailed, the report and resolutions would appear upon the journal, or be printed among the documents of the House?

The CHAIR replied that it would not. The entry on the journal would be a simple entry of the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. M. MORRIS desired to know whether this motion would include the bill either reported, or to be reported, from that committee, to prevent the practice of duelling.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. ROBINSON of Maine and Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, asked to be excused from voting, on the ground of having been absent during the discussion; which was given to them.

Mr. ELMORE asked to be excused on the ground of being a member of the committee; but he was refused.

Mr. JONES of Wisconsin said, as this was a matter deeply affecting him, he would also appeal to the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw the motion to lay on the table, for he felt that, if it prevailed, he should lie under at least the tacit censure of the House.

Mr. PICKENS did not withdraw the motion.

Mr. WISE gave notice to the House that it was useless to lay the subject on the table, for he should demand its consideration as a question affecting his privileges.

The motion to lay on the table was then decided in the negative—yeas 28, nays 167.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to recommit the report to the select committee, with instructions to strike out the argumentative part thereof, and report the facts of the case.

The CHAIR ruled it not in order, pending the motion to postpone, which latter took precedence.

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded to discuss the motion to postpone, and went over the arguments that had been used in reply to his remarks upon a former day. He argued, from several considerations, that the report ought to be printed, stamped with the seal of reprobation, that future legislators might know the precedent, and that, the report being rejected, its character might be known also.

Mr. WISE entered his protest, solemnly, for various reasons, which he assigned at length, against the reception of the report, and against any sanction of it by the House in any form; but if the House chose to print it for the purpose of reprobating it, according to the suggestion of Mr. ADAMS, he had no objection. He said that he wished no delay, and protested against it, and demanded, as his right, a trial before his peers, and openly before the House and the country.

Mr. GRAVES said he was not only willing, but anxious, that the testimony should be printed, but he protested against the printing of the report, which he described to be a partial and garbled statement. He was opposed to the postponement, but in favor of its being recommitted, with instructions to report back the evidence alone, though he submitted that it ought not to be received by the House as evidence. He should abide his trial by his constitutional and legal peers.

The question was then taken, first on postponing, and decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 109.

So the first branch of the proposition was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS asked if his motion would then be in order.

The CHAIR entertained the motion, and Mr. ADAMS submitted it as indicated above.

Mr. TOUCEY raised the point of order, that, as the House had ordered the yeas and nays on the whole proposition, one branch of it having been voted on, the other must be taken immediately.

The CHAIR ruled it to be in order, both under the rule on dividing propositions, and on the ground that the motion to commit was a privileged motion.

Mr. GLASSCOCK called for a division of this question, dividing the motion to recommit the report from that to recommit the motion to print.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays on the first branch, which were ordered.

Mr. ELMORE wished to be distinctly understood. He had wished so to discharge his duty as to feel conscious that he had done justice to others, and to his own character. If the report should be sent back, under the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he should be at a loss to know what the House wished. He could not tell what was meant by the instruction to strike out the argumentative part. Was it to take the report of the majority, and strike out the argumentative part of that? The question of privilege was left untouched. He considered the committee ordered to inquire into the question of privilege. He had done it; and unless relieved distinctly, by a vote of the House, he should feel compelled to go into that question again, with very little difference of opinion from what he had entertained heretofore. He should rejoice to be relieved from so painful a duty; but any duty imposed by the House, he would not shrink from.

Mr. PICKENS said it must be very plain that if the resolutions of the 28th of February remained unaltered, it would place the committee and his friend and colleague in a very delicate and embarrassing position; and with that view he submitted the following amendment to Mr. ADAMS's instructions:

"And report on the facts without any resolution as to punishment, or any reasoning going to show what ought to be the description or extent of it."

Mr. ELMORE remarked that so long as the original resolutions existed on the journal directing the committee to report whether a breach of privilege had been committed, the committee, however glad they might be to be relieved of that duty, could not report the evidence alone, unless again specially instructed, or relieved of the duty originally imposed upon them.

Mr. BELL made some remarks for the purpose of showing that the recommitment, was a revival of the select committee, and it was competent to recommit in any manner under any instruction. He considered that there was no report, it not having been made in conformity with the orders of the House. The committee, therefore, were still in existence, and he hoped they would be instructed merely to report the facts and evidence, and let the House afterwards set upon that evidence, or give further instructions, as might be necessary.

Mr. MERCER was in favor of recommitment.

Mr. POPE remarked, in favor of recommitment, that it was an every day's occurrence in courts of law.

Mr. RARIDEN read some instructions he would suggest as a substitute, viz: for the committee to report their journal and the evidence taken without comments, and that the committee be relieved from deducing any argument therefrom that a breach of privilege has been committed.

Mr. TOUCEY called for the reading of the journal of the select committee of the 11th of April, by which it was shown that the resolution declaring Messrs. GRAVES, WISE and JONES had been guilty of a breach of privilege, was adopted unanimously in the committee.

Mr. T. then went on to express his desire, that if the report should be committed to any committee of which he was a member, that they would do it with a distinct expression of what they expected. If the House would undo what they had done, and would rescind the order originally appointing the committee, and take from them, under the rules of the House and parliamentary law, the petitions submitted to them, so as to relieve them from the most painful part of their duty, every member of the committee would rejoice. But having imposed a responsibility under which the committee had performed their duty, he could not approve of rescinding the order indirectly, which had been imposed directly.

Mr. PICKENS modified his amendment as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the original resolution instructing this committee, as required them to inquire and report whether a breach of privilege, &c. had been committed, be, and is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. ADAMS accepted the amendment as a modification.

Mr. JENIFER offered some reasons in favor of a recommitment, with a view to have the evidence presented to the House, with the opinion of the committee, in pursuance of the original order—whether, in their opinions, a breach of privilege has been committed. He thought the committee would be bound by any instructions which might be given them now, because it would amount to a new institution of the committee. Mr. J. also made some inquiries and remarks in relation to the manner in which the report had been published, surreptitiously, as he contended, and some conversation took place between Mr. J. and Mr. GRANTLAND thereon,

Mr. ELMORE made some explanations on the same subject.

Mr. MARTIN, it being late, moved an adjournment.

Mr. BOON asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SERGEANT suggested to Mr. ADAMS so to modify his motion as to report only on that part of the testimony relating to persons other than members; and where any member is affected, to report only the evidence. There was much of the report of the majority of which he highly approved, and he returned his thanks to the learned chairman for making it.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina moved an adjournment; lost—84 to 88.

Mr. BOON made some remarks in reference to his having called for the reading of the report.

Mr. GLASCOCK spoke at a late hour, and at considerable length, upon the course taken by the committee, and with a view to give the reasons which governed his votes upon the preliminary questions.

Mr. G. withdrew the call for a division of the question, and Mr. PETRIKIN renewed it.

After some remarks from Mr. FAIRFIELD,

Mr. ADAMS again modified his resolution, so as to strike out the phrase "that the original resolution be rescinded," and to insert that "the commit ee be discharged from its further consideration."

Mr. FAIRFIELD said he had moved an adjournment with the intention of addressing the House upon this subject to-morrow, but the adjournment was refused, and he would study to be content. Considering, however, the attitude in which he stood, in reference to this question, he could not permit the vote to be taken, late as it was, and fatigued as the members were, without saying a word or two.

By the resolution of the 28th of February, a select committee was instructed to investigate a certain transaction, and to inquire whether any breach of the privileges of this House had been committed It passed by a vote of almost unexampled unanimity. This branch of the resolution, however, is now proposed, by the motion, as modified, of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) to be rescinded. We are now, said Mr. F. called upon to tread back—to acknowledge ourselves in an error—to abandon an important part of the original inquiry, and to start upon a new track. Wherefore? What were the reasons for such a course? What new light had broke in upon the minds of gentlemen? For one, said Mr. F. I have been anxiously listening to hear some new and convincing reasons to justify the turning this short corner, to palliate this seeming inconsistency, but I have listened in vain. Perhaps there is something in this matter more than meets the eye or ear. The resolution of inquiry was adopted by a vote of 152 to 49, or thereabouts, and now, many of those who composed this large majority seem as anxious to rescind the resolution as they were on the 28th of February to adopt it. Has a voice come from the public, since that time, condemnatory of our course, and are gentlemen endeavoring to make amends for running counter to the wishes and interests of the people? On the contrary, I had thought, said Mr. F. that the evidence upon that point was directly the other way. Some fifteen or twenty thousand of the people have sent in their memorials approving our course, and bidding us God-speed. Indeed, most of them demanding the strictest investigation at our hands. But all this, and the indications of public opinion as manifested through the public prints, seem now to amount to nothing in the minds of some gentlemen: reasons far superior and paramount to these and all former considerations exist for abandoning a course so unitedly and honorably commenced. But what are they? Will some gentleman be good enough to inform us? As yet we are in the dark.

It has been insinuated by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] that the movement is a political one. Sir, said Mr. F. was the vote of 152 to 49 a political vote? There can be no pretence for saying that. If, then, the question has become political, let me inquire how, and by whose agency? If it was not political to vote for a resolution, it surely cannot be regarded as political to adhere to it. One side of this House are now where they were on the 28th of February, entertaining the same sentiments of the subject of inquiry, and adhering still to the then highly-favored resolution. If any party has abandoned it, or any portion of it, and are now more desirous to baffle than to prosecute the inquiry, they best know why: so far all is left to conjecture. The reasons offered for recommitting the report, do not go to justify the rescindment of this branch of the resolution. The committee, on a re-examination, can as well inquire whether there has been a breach of privileges committed, as if their report and resolutions had excited no dissatisfaction whatever. The recommitment of part, and the rescindment of another part, have no necessary connection. Why, then, should the latter be proposed? If this matter is to be got rid of, perhaps it is thought that a side blow will best effect that object. It is to be hoped, however, that neither the motion to recommit or rescind will prevail, but that the case will proceed, and the House be brought to a direct vote on the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to strike out the words, "and the motion to print," in Mr. ADAMS's resolution.

Mr. MENEFEE again insisted that the report was not the report of the majority.

Mr. TOUCEY insisted that it was, and more, the result to which the committee had come, had been agreed to in committee unanimously, so far as that a breach of privilege had been committed. Moreover, Mr. PATTON, the now absent member had concurred in it.

Mr. GRANT moved an adjournment: lost 75 to 88.

Mr. TOUCEY resumed, and stated that if the motion of Mr. ADAMS prevailed, the reports neither of the majority nor of the minority, nor even the evidence, could be printed. The whole would be suppressed, and those who voted for that motion would virtually vote to suppress the whole testimony.

Mr. DUNCAN moved to strike out the words "papers purporting to be the," whenever they occur.

Mr. MENEFEE again insisted that, inasmuch as Mr. POTTER had not assented to the majority report, while the committee was in session, therefore that it was not the report of the majority.

Mr. DAVEE renewed the motion to adjourn: lost.

Mr. ADAMS took the same ground as Mr. MENEFEE on another point, viz. that the report was not signed.

Mr. DUNCAN, after a few remarks in its support, called for the yeas and nays on his amendment, which were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS rose to correct an erroneous statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] That gentleman had said that the report made by the majority of the bank committee of 1832, of which he (Mr. T.) and the gentleman were members, had been signed by those who sanctioned it. Such was not the case according to his recollection. The report o majority had been handed in by Judge Clayton of Georgia. In that case, he well remembered that some of the reasoning by which the report was sustained had not received his entire approbation: that is, if he had prepared the report, some of the arguments upon which the conclusions were founded would have been omitted, and others introduced. This was almost invariably the case in all reports. The majority concurred in opinion as to the conclusion—the result. But we all know that the chairman alone was held to be particularly responsible for the phraseology, language, and illustrations. Hence he was indulged in drawing up reports on all points not involving principles.

The statements Mr. T. made with a full knowledge of the general accuracy of the gentleman from Massachusetts, whose good memory alone was required to guard against error. But he did not fear, although years had passed since that report was made, but that it would be found he had not imprudently weighed his recollections against the gentleman.

So far then as the proceedings of the bank committee were to be relied upon, they furnished a full justification for the course which had been pursued in this instance. And he appealed to every experienced member of the House to say, whether a course like that taken in this case, and in the case of the bank committee, was not in truth pursued by almost all committees when elaborate discussions were indulged in. In fact, no other process could insure a report at all. For it would not be contended that four men could be found who would adopt precisely the same language to express their ideas in a long report. They could agree readily in opinions, but each one would have a favorite mode of reaching their objects. Mr. T. said the House might reject the report of this committee, if it pleased the House so to do, with propriety; but then it was unjust to found such a proceeding upon alleged misconduct of a committee, where none existed. And as he thought that the proceedings of a committee, of which he had been a member, had been, without warrant, brought to bear, he had been compelled, by a sense of justice, to correct the error.

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his motion.

Mr. MERCER and Mr. GRAY simultaneously rose and moved an adjournment: lost, 78 to 88.

Mr. PETRIKEN moved a call of the House.

Mr. BRONSON moved an adjournment, which prevailed; ayes 90, noes 67.

The petition presented by Mr. HAWKINS of North Carolina yesterday, was from a number of citizens of that State, praying for the establishment of a post route from Henderson, a depot on the Raleigh and Gaston railroad, to Oxford, in the county of Granville, and on Mr. H's motion, it was referred to the Commitee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, April 30, 1838.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of a number of citizens of New Jersey, praying Congress not to admit any new State into the Union whose constitution tolerates domestic slavery: laid on the table.

Also, the petition of 120 men and 84 women, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia: motion to receive laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a similar petition from 27 inhabitants of the town of Litchfield, New York, which was disposed of in like manner.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the law allowing a drawback of duty upon foreign goods re-exported, as that foreign coal re-exported, not to be landed at any foreign port, but to be consumed on board of vessels navigated by steam between this and any foreign country, may be entitled to a drawback of duty.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of Opothle Yoholo, a Creek Indian, praying compensation for a negro lost in the military service of the United States: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the Committee on Private Land Claims was authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of the New York Peace Society, praying that, in the adjustment of our differences with Mexico, the instrumentality of an arbitrator may be employed; also, suggesting the propriety of the establishment of a Congress of Nations for the purpose of settling difficulties which may arise among different nations, and for averting the evils of war: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial on the subject of the Cherokee treaty; which was laid on the table.

Mr. RIVES presented the memorial of Ann Eliza Laurie, praying for arrears of pension: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of Francisco Gutturiez de Arajo, praying confirmation of claim to a tract of land: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky rose to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. WRIGHT.] We have arrived, said he, at a very important moment in the monetary affairs of the country. Some of the banks in Boston and New York have in fact already resumed specie payments, and others are expected to follow that example in a few days. He hoped that example would be generally imitated, at least by all the banks which have the ability to do so, except the Southwestern banks, which, he was afraid, were not prepared. But the object of his inquiry was to ascertain whether there was before the committee, or the Executive branch of the Government, any intention to bring forward any measure other than that which had passed this body, and was now lying in the House of Representatives, with a view to aid and encourage the banks in that resumption. If there was no intention on the part of the chairman or the Executive branch of the Government to do any thing to aid the banks, it had been thought by some that the duty devolved on him to suggest some such measure.

Mr. WRIGHT replied that he could answer the inquiry of the Senator. There was nothing before the committee at present in relation to the matter. What had been referred to that committee by the Senate had then been acted on. Touching any views entertained by the Executive, Mr. W. professed himself to be as ignorant of as the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky then offered the following joint resolution, which was read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no discrimination shall be made as to the currency or medium of payment in the several branches of the Public Revenue, or in debts or dues to the Government; and that, until otherwise ordered by Congress, the notes of sound banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States, under suitable restrictions, to be forthwith prescribed and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be received in payment of the revenue and of debts and dues to the Government, and shall be subsequently disbursed, in course of public expenditure, to all public creditors who are willing to receive them."

Mr. GRUNDY wished to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to a single point, not with any hostile views to the resolution itself, or for the purpose of expressing any opinions on the subject, but with a view to a more distinct expression of opinion; and it was this: whether the resolution ought not to restrict its operations to notes of banks in the vicinity in which they are to be received and disbursed? Otherwise the resolution might produce difficulties which the Senator perhaps did not contemplate. He supposed the Senator would not object to restricting the resolution in the way he suggested.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that was matter of detail, which would necessarily come before the Senate when the subject came up for discussion. If the honorable Senator from Tennessee had attended to the reading of the resolution, he would have perceived that it did not require an indiscriminate receipt of all notes; but they were to be taken under suitable regulations, as the Secretary of the Treasury might prescribe; such notes, for instance, as the people were willing to receive in all parts of the country. These, however, were mere matters of detail, which could be made to meet the exigency when the subject came up for discussion.

The resolution was then ordered to a second reading.

The bill to grant to the States and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads and canals the right of way through the public lands was taken up.

Mr. LYON then moved the following amendment: to insert at the end of the fourth section the following:

"And where any of the sections through which any such road, or canal, or its branches, shall pass, have not been offered at public sale, and therefore not subject to entry, such State or company may enter the same at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, when the remaining lands in the district where said sections may lie shall have been proclaimed by the President of the United States, and offered for sale."

Mr. TIPTON thought the bill a very important one, and sincerely trusted that gentlemen from the new States would not embarrass it by adding amendments, the consequence of which might be to defeat the measure. There were other bills pending before the Senate where the Senator would have an opportunity of introducing the provision he so much desired. And he appealed to the gentleman to withdraw it from the bill now under consideration.

Mr. LYON said he could not have anticipated objections to so reasonable a measure. Making roads through the public lands more than trebled the value of those adjoining. Gentlemen seemed to argue that the amendment contemplated giving away the public domain: no such thing! What did the amendment propose? Merely to allow these companies the right to each alternate section at the minimum price, (one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre,) which was as much as the public land usually sold for. It would hold out inducements to these companies to go on with their improvements, and nothing tended more essentially to the improvement of States and Territories than good roads. He would venture to affirm that where one dollar would be taken from the public Treasury by the adoption of his amendment, thousands would be put into it. He spoke from a thorough knowledge of this subject, derived from personal observation. His object in offering it, was the improvement it would be the means of effecting in the new countries, and the increased value of the public domain to the Government. As it seemed, however, to meet with so much and such strong objection, he would withdraw it.

Mr. TIPTON then moved to fill up the blank in the bill with 120 feet.

Mr. KING moved to fill the blank with 200 feet. He thought that would be indispensable, as the trees of that country were usually of such immense size, being frequently 80 feet below the limbs, that, if one were to fall, it would entirely obstruct the road.

Mr. DAVIS that 80 feet was as great a width as was necessary for all the purposes. Mr. D. then adverted to Connecticut, where, he believed, the right of way was still wider than that contemplated by gentlemen, the result of which was a neglected waste on both sides of the road.

The question was then taken on Mr. KING's motion, and the blank filled with 200 feet.

Mr. LINN moved to amend the bill by extending its operations to the Territories; which was agreed to; and

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NEOSHO TERRITORY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. KING to set apart the territory of the United States north of the Missouri and west of the Mississippi, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, for the northern Indians.

Mr. LUMPKIN addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: When I consider the magnitude of this question, in all its various bearings, and how deeply it concerns the honor and character of this Government, I can but approach it under a due sense of the responsibility which devolves on me. I regret that the consideration and progress of this very important measure should be embarrassed by the proposed amendment of the honorable Senator from Alabama—an appendage calculated, in my judgment, if sustained, to defeat the original measure itself. This amendment, in connection with the remarks made in its support, which have fallen from several honorable Senators, gives to the proposition a sectional character, which cannot fail, if the amendment be incorporated in the bill, to defeat the whole measure. I represent a portion of the Southern people who have as deep an interest in sectional questions as any other portion of this Union—a people who well understand their political rights—a people who will never demand more, or be satisfied with less, than their equal and just rights. My life, my interest, and my feelings, are identified with the people whom I represent. My obligations to watch over, protect, and defend, that portion of their interest confided to my care on this floor, can never be forgotten by me for a moment. No, sir: my obligations to the people of Georgia are peculiarly strong. But I am not to be frightened or alarmed from the pathway of duty by the cry of Southern rights, when there is no ground for that alarm, and when that sectional interest is unnecessarily introduced in a way calculated to defeat a favorite measure, which I have for many years past labored to consummate.

The bill upon your table for the organization of the Indian Territory and Government west, in its first section, defines the Territory designed to become the scene of Indian reform. This Territory embraces a country of about six hundred miles by two hundred, and may be stated to embrace a surface of 76,800,000 acres of land. The population now settled, and intended to be settled, on this surface, is estimated at 133,883, of which number about 75,000 are already located in the country.

The territory embraced in the bill is directly west and northwest of the States of Arkansas and Missouri, and from north to south extends over eight or ten degrees of latitude, the highest northern point being 43° north.

This, sir, is an accurate description of the country embraced in the bill, according to the map which I now hold in my hand, and which is said to be a near approach to accuracy.

Thus it will be seen, from the evidence here presented, that more than two thirds of the Territory designated in this bill is north of latitude 36½—the Compromise line agreed upon at the time the agitation and discussion took place in Congress upon the question of the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union. It is true that I never approved of that compromise; but so it is, that it has heretofore been acquiesced in as a settled compromise, and for one, I am averse to disturbing and agitating that question at this time, and upon this occasion. The South has no just cause of complaint in regard to the location of the Indians, from which she will be finally and forever relieved by the provisions of this bill. The Indians who have emigrated, and will emigrate from all the Southern States, will be located something north of their former places of abode; and from the provisions of this bill, it is not proposed to locate a solitary tribe of the Indians from any one of the North and Northwestern States south of 36½ of north latitude.

And what is the proposition of my honorable friend from Alabama [Mr. KING.] Why, sir, he proposes to add to the Territory designated in the bill, all the Northwestern domain of the United States, to which the Indian title has not heretofore been extinguished, and which is not embraced in any of the present States and Territories of the United States. A country undefined in extent, and thought by some gentlemen to embrace a country containing a larger surface than one-half of the organized States of this Union.

Sir, my high respect for the intelligence, and my confidence in the purity of the motives, of the mover of this amendment, [Mr. KING,] would leave me in surprise, but for the assurance which I feel that the error into which my friend has fallen on this subject, is chargeable alone to his not having duly examined and considered the measure now under consideration. Who can seriously expect to succeed in the organization of a Territorial Government for the emigrating and half civilized Indians, when the territory embraced in that Government spreads over a country so vast in extent, and a great portion of it populated by savage and wild men, who have had little intercourse with civilized man? Moreover, sir, the Indians who inhabit the country proposed to be added by the amendment, are wholly incapable and unprepared to avail themselves of the benefits extended to the more enlightened tribes by the provisions of this bill. The adoption of the proposed amendment cannot fail to destroy every reasonable prospect of accomplishing the beneficent and kind objects designed by its friends for the benefit of those tribes which have been removed from the several States and located in the West. It would render the bill an inefficient and useless measure, and change the entire prospect of benefiting those upon whom it is designed to operate.

I regret to find the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] withholding his support from this important measure, and advocating the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama. I feel assured, that if the Senator from South Carolina had brought his gigantic mind to bear upon this deeply interesting subject, he would have been prepared to give it his support. I am justified in this conclusion, from the fact, that the very plan, in all its most important bearings, embraced in this bill, was in the year 1825 the favorite policy of that Senator. He at that time, as Secretary of War, made an able and lucid report upon this subject, which may be seen in the volume of State papers now open before me, and which substantially, to my mind, recommends every important feature embraced in this bill. The very tribes embraced in the bill, as well as the territory, together with an entire change of Indian policy approaching the provisions of this bill, are recommended in the report of the honorable Senator to which I refer. And yet, he now desires more time, to reflect and make up his mind on this important measure, and seems not to be even acquainted with the provisions of the bill on your table.

A slight examination of the bill must at once remove most of the objections suggested by the Senator. The bill forces nothing upon the Indian tribes who are intended to be benefited by its provisions. Each tribe will still be left free to make its own laws and regulations, for the government of its own people within its respective limits. The Confederacy proposed to the different tribes may be entered into or not, at their own pleasure. It is true that most of the tribes who have emigrated to the West, have been consulted on the subject of the contemplated organization and form of Government which is the subject of our present consideration, and have expressed their opinions in favor of the measure. It is also true that several of the largest and most enlightened tribes have not yet expressed a formal opinion on the subject; and it is known that many of their leading men have expressed opinions adverse to this measure. It is therefore a subject still open for investigation and consideration; and I indulge the belief that proper investigation cannot fail to counteract the opinions of the few selfish and leading men amongst the Indian tribes, who have been disposed to create opposition to the policy of the Government in regard to this matter.

I regret that this bill has not received a greater share of the attention of honorable Senators, who have manifested opposition to the measure. In the opening discussion, it was ably supported by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. TIPTON,] in a speech chiefly composed of facts and figures. In that speech most of the material historical facts necessary to the support of this measure, together with a considerable collection of statistical information, was laid before the Senate in a condensed form, which placed within the reach of every Senator the means of correct information, without the toil and research which it must have cost the Senator who had the honor to submit it for the information of others.

This bill advances one more step towards the consummation of a most important object, which has long engrossed the minds and exertions of some few individuals, scattered through a long course of years, whose knowledge of the true character and condition of the native American race had awakened their sympathy to a sense of the necessity of some vigorous effort to arrest the extermination, and total extinction, of the aboriginal race.

In a retrospect of the past, we may with gratitude to a kind Providence congratulate ourselves at the unparalleled prosperity and advancement of our beloved country, since the first settlement of our European fathers on this continent. Our onward progress as a people is justly the admiration of the whole civilized world. Our good form of Government, our arts, our science, our towns, our cities, our agriculture, our commerce, our internal improvements, and every thing else, have sprung up in a few hundred years.

And, sir, we have wrested this delightful land from the hands of its native lords; and whether it has been done by force or fraud, the obligation which now devolves on us to rescue and save the remaining remnants is not altered or changed. The allusions made by honorable Senators to my long and untiring efforts in support of the policy which is now the subject of consideration; and my being called the parent of this measure, I should consider, if supported by facts, highly complimentary. But, sir, I have no pretensions to the honor of having originated this measure. General Washington was the first public man from whom I recollect to have seen evidence, to satisfy my mind, that he looked forward to the plan which I now have so much solicitude to see consummated. Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Adams, with many other enlightened statesmen, had given official evidence of their approbation of the policy now under consideration, before I had the honor of a position which authorized me to move in this matter.

But, sir, it is a subject of the highest gratification to me to have been the first member in either House of Congress to make a direct move on this subject; and that gratification is greatly increased by the share of success, though small which has attended my humble efforts. My first year's labor (some ten years ago,) resulted in getting an appropriation of $15,000, to defray the expense of an exploring expedition to the West, by competent agents of the Government, accompanied by delegations of several tribes of the Indians then residing in the States. That duty was performed to the satisfaction of the Government; and the report made by these exploring agents tended to remove the idle impression that a suitable country could not be found. They not only found a country, but a most delightful country—one among the many delightful garden spots of America—a country possessing all the natural advantages to make a people prosperous and happy.

It is true, sir, I did not stop here; that was only my first step, and my march has been onward ever since.

I have been inclined, and have done all that I could, to produce a radical change in our Indian policy. I have long since been disgusted, and with shame and confusion of face looked at the policy pursued by this Government towards the Indians. Look at your volume of Indian treaties. What do you there see? One recorded farce after another, couched in language of high official and formal mockery. I rejoice, sir, that I have never had any agency in making an Indian treaty. And while I am here urging the execution of an Indian treaty at this session of Congress, I only do so because this Government will not comply with its obligations, due to the State which I represent, through any other channel.

My settled opinion, for the last twelve years, has been, that we should never make another treaty with a poor, subjugated Indian tribe.

My plan is, and has been, for the States and and Federal Government to legislate direct for their Indians, in the same manner that we legislate for orphans, minors, and other persons who are incompetent to take charge of their own rights. And as far as I have been concerned, I have acted upon this principle in my own State, and have more than once urged it upon the consideration of this Government to pursue the same course. But, sir, in my legislation for these unfortunate sons of the forest, my liberality, my care for their true benefit, my magnanimity shall be surpassed by no Senator on this floor. If, in any of these instruments called treaties, injustice may appear to have been done to any, let us speedily repair the wrong. I would willingly restore them fourfold for all the wrongs which may have been done them.

Although the policy of this Government towards the Indians, is in many respects marked by too much disregard to the true interest of the native race; yet a critical examination into the history and settlement, as well as the policy, of all the American colonies, may in many cases plead some justification. In the first instance, a plea may be founded on the weakness of the colonists, and the strength of the natives, which put in operation that first law of nature, self preservation. This weakness on the part of the first European settlers, introduced this treaty making policy. This conciliating plan, in the absence of power, was resorted to by all the colonies.

Nor do I condemn or regret the success of our race on this continent; no, sir, I have none of that spirit of fanaticism, or sickly sympathy for these interesting people, which induces me to regret that they have been supplanted by a superior race—by husbandmen, for whom the God of Nature designed the more appropriate use of the earth. I cannot desire that this flourishing land of light and liberty, with all its various and beautiful improvements, should be retroceded to the hand of uncivilized man, and again become a wild wilderness, a dense forest, for the wild man to roam and hunt in from place to place.

Thus, sir, while I see much to regret and condemn in the past policy of Europeans toward the native race; I feel it my duty to say, that it requires examination, reflection, and much consideration, in order to form a correct opinion of the past.

Up to the present period of our history, as a people, I think it must be admitted, our intercourse regulations over the Indians have been most prejudicial to their best interest. If they had been left to a state of nature, they would probably have been in a much better condition, as a whole, than they are at this time.

It does appear to me, that the policy of this Government has rather tended to encourage than restrain the barbarous habits of these people. At any rate, we have progressed in a policy that, to my mind, has become insupportable. Until the emigrating and colonizing plan was taken up by the Government, no general effort had been made to benefit the Indians of our country; and the disabilities under which they now labor are of a most perplexing character, under which they are perishing, and cannot long survive. Unless we speedily change our policy, the day is not far distant when there will not be a solitary one left to tell the sad story of his progenitors. But should success speedily crown the plan for which I have so long labored and toiled, in the face of a most powerful and talented opposition, my hopes will then be revived for the salvation of a remnant of this peculiar race of people. A people for whose real and permanent welfare I feel all the solicitude of which I am capable of feeling for any portion of the human family.

Most of those who from religious motives made efforts to better the condition of the Indians, have become fully convinced that without colonization and civil government, without laws, most of these people would perish. These conclusions have been confirmed by two hundred years' experience in the Eastern States. The hopeful beginnings of Elliot, Brainard, and others, soon disappeared. Their converts, I hope, got to a better world; but what was the condition of their Indian congregations very soon after their decease? Why, most wretched, depraved, and perishing. Missionaries have continued to labor for the New England and New York Indians ever since; but, notwithstanding all these efforts, those tribes have been constantly sinking deeper and deeper in degeneracy and wretchedness, and perishing away into insignificance and nothing. I entertain no doubt but the efforts of these good men have benefited a few individuals; but, take them as a whole people, and their condition has been constantly becoming more and more deplorable. The better prospects and condition of the Southern tribes, and particularly the Cherokees, cannot be justly attributed to missionary labors or operations. No, sir: the glory belongs to Him who overruled evil and brought good out of it.

During the Revolutionary war, and at its close, there were Tories who fled from their country, to escape the punishment due to their crimes, and joined the Indians, and fought by their sides, amalgamated with them, and took up their permanent residence amongst them. Some of these men had property, intelligence, and education, and soon acquired great influence amongst the Indians, and, in most cases, were careful to educate the children which they had by Indian mothers. These men and their descendants taught the Southern Indians the arts of husbandry, industry, and imparted to them their first ideas of a system of law, which should secure individual property. Thus they acquired a knowledge of the first principles of human prosperity; and civil order and law being thus introduced, they went on improving. The circumstance, too, of their having for a long time a large territory, unintruded upon by the whites, was favorable to their imbibing lofty feelings of character and independence, which is indispensable to the political advancement of any people. These improvements, thus made in the condition of the Southern Indians, greatly facilitated the operations of the missionaries who settled in the Indian country at a subsequent period. These missionaries were not placed among a people who were all savages, but always took up their abodes in neighborhoods far advanced in civilization.

Many of the Indians and Indian countrymen had good houses and farms, and large herds of cattle, sheep and hogs, besides household furniture, implements of husbandry, and a number of negro slaves. The missionaries, in settling among such a people as I have described, found a state of society not widely differing from that which, in former days, might often be found in newly settled countries by civilized men. Some of the missionaries who set tled among the Cherokees, were good people, and were very useful to the natives; but, at the same time, most of them advanced their own circumstances and comfort, and improved their own condition as much as they did that of the Indians. These missionary efforts in the Cherokee country have been exaggerated, and published to the world in religious magazines, which will likely be handed down to posterity, and pervert the truth on the historic page, when the present generation shall have passed away. Be assured, the greatly improved condition of the Cherokee people cannot be justly attributed to missionary labor; but to the establishment of civil order, produced by the means to which I have already adverted. Had the Cherokee people been located where they could have remained undisturbed, they might, and no doubt would, have prospered and done well. But this was not the case, the Southern States, as their white population increased, following the example of the Eastern and Middle States, and by the exercise of their own rights, found it expedient and proper to take such steps as should change their Indian population for that of the white, which they considered superior. Moreover, they found it expedient, to exercise the common right of all the States, and which the older States had done before them, to take the control and government of their Indian population into their own hands. Such a course was in accordance with what had been the common and established policy of the country, from the time of the first European settlements up to the present time. It was most unreasonable to expect that an exception with a few of the Southern States would occur, to that which had been the invariable practice every where else in America for upwards of three hundred years. For many years I clearly saw that the Southern tribes, as they became crowded by a white population, must either change their residence, as most of the Northern tribes had done, or like those who still remain, become subject to a state of things which would inevitably cause them to dwindle, perish, and pass away from the face of the earth.

In view of this state of things, I have been forced to the conclusion, that the plan which we now advocate merits the support and approbation of the wise and the good from every section of our Union. It appears to me to be a measure so vastly important to a most interesting and peculiar portion of the human family, and a people, too, to whom we are under the strongest possible obligations, that every honorable Senator on this floor should for once forget all party names and distinction disregard party or sectional interest, and each one strive to do most to preserve and save these people, who have so many just claims on our favorable consideration.

I have often been surprised at the unbelief of many intelligent and well-informed persons in regard to the practicability of the civilization and improvement of the native race of our country. Give them the same opportunity, and they will improve just like other people. Let us hereafter consider them as human beings, of like passions and propensities with ourselves; and in thus considering them, I know, from my own knowledge and observation, we shall only do them justice. Give them liberty and law, and at no distant day they will exhibit a community which will do honor to the legislation which we now urge for their benefit.

They are not only endowed with all the natural and necessary faculties for mental cultivation and improvement, but whenever the opportunity of proper cultivation has been extended to them, they have as rarely failed to make good use of their opportunities as other people of other nations. I will not dwell upon the thousands of cases, which might be individually referred to, for the purpose of establishing the fact, of the natural capacity of this race of people being as well adapted to mental cultivation, as that of the people of other nations; because the reflection and knowledge of each Senator must bear testimony to the correctness of my statement on this subject.

Let us give them a fair trial, as provided for in this bill. Let us take this first step towards elevating this people in the scale of human beings. This bill violates no existing law or treaty, but goes far to carry out and fulfil many of the existing obligations of this Government to various tribes who are embraced in the bill. This bill places these harrassed people beyond the reach of State interference; and the right of soil should be as securely guaranteed to these people, to them and their posterity for ever, as it is to the people of any State in this Union.

The institutions of these people should, as far as practicable, be assimilated to our own in every respect. Let us bind them to our great confederacy of States by the ties of union and family fraternity. Let us even look to the day when they may become a bright star in the American constellation of States. Let these people receive from our hands all the liberality and encouragement which will promote their true interest. Let us prudently aid them in the formation of suitable and and good laws for their Government. Let us watch over and guard them from indiscreet legislation in the first stages of their new Government. The course suggested is the proper one to obliterate past injuries; and new pursuits and new prospects of a cheering and encouraging nature, are best calculated to turn their minds from the painful recollections of the past, and cause them to look forward to the prize set before them, with that hope which gives joy and peace. Increasing comfort, progressive improvement, prospective preferment and distinction, will nourish a laudable enterprise and ambition in this interesting race of long neglected people.

Such a course as the one suggested would, I trust, extinguish every unkind feeling which may have been taken with them to their new homes. Let us endeavor to obliterate from their memories all past strifes and animosities. I was desirous myself that these people should have been allowed, at once, a delegate of their own choosing on the floor of Congress, one of their own people. I know they have competent men, native Indians, who could not fail to be respected on the floor of Congress, for their intelligence, and genteel deportment. By such a course they would not only feel that their relation to us was amity and peace, but they would soon learn to feel a family and kindred interest in the welfare and prosperity of the nation and Government of which they would form a part. Then, sir, we should no longer need a military force to preserve peace and good order amongst these native Americans, whose common origin from the same great parent with ourselves entitles them to our special care and regard. Wretched indeed will always be the state and condition of any people who must be kept in subordination by a military force.

Instead of further delay and consideration on this subject, as has been recommended by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] to my mind, now is the auspicious moment for this Government to make a vigorous effort to move forward and do something for the permanent interest and benefit of these people, by extending to them at least the advantages contemplated by this bill. Now is the accepted time for action. The Indians stand at your door and knock. Now is the most favorable time to make the best possible impression on the minds of these people. If we do not proceed now, a retrograde movement may be apprehended. Many intelligent men amongst these Indian tribes have long been looking to the state of things contemplated by this bill. Let us not disappoint them. Justice calls for this last effort to save these people. Humanity requires it; conscience demands it; posterity will admire it; and Heaven will award its blessing to those who shall be instrumental in consummating this beneficent plan to redeem from ruin an interesting portion of our fellow-men.

Mr. KING had no disposition, if his health permitted, to consume much of the time of the Senate in support of the amendment, and he was the less disposed to do so, as he was fully aware what little hopes there were of its success. He regretted the temper of the Senate on this subject, and could not but feel surprised that an amendment so important to the frontier States of the Southwest should not meet with a more favorable consideration. He had no disposition whatever to embarrass the bill which the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. LUMPKIN,] had so much at heart, and which he had been nursing with such parental care; he had no disposition to strangle it, as the gentleman feared, but at the same time he could not approve the continuation of a course of policy calculated to press heavily on the country from whence he came. While gentlemen had this extraordinary kindness for the unfortunate red men, they ought to give them a country sufficiently large to support them, and in which they would not be driven by starvation, and want of elbow room, to depredate on their white neighbors. Was it intended that all the Indians, Northern as well as Southern, should be crowded on our Southwestern borders, in order that the whole country north of the Compromise line should be kept exclusively for a white population? It was not to be disguised that it was. There were already 75,000 Indians in the Territory embraced in this bill, being as many as the country can conveniently support; and it was proposed to crowd more there—wild Indians too—and what would be the consequence? Why the plunder of their white neighbors, and this could not be prevented, for we could not keep up a standing army sufficient to keep them in awe: the States would not agree to it. Well might the Senator from Arkansas say that the object was to get more States at the Northwest; and he would ask the Senator from Indiana, if he would oppose the amendment, if he believed there would not be more States formed to the Northwest?

Mr. K. regretted that his Southern friends did not view the subject in the light that he did; but if they were willing to take the consequences, all he could say was that he warned them in time, and that his skirts were clear. He felt for the Indians as much sympathy as any man; he had always manifested the strongest desire to protect them, to promote their welfare, and to provide for their civilization and improvement. He knew that they could not be protected as long as they remained in the States, and knew that if they did, they would share the same fate which the honorable Senator from Indiana said was reserved for the Indians of his State on their first outbreak. Let them, said the honorable gentleman, take the life of one of our people, and they will be exterminated. We of the South, said Mr. K. did not exterminate them, though they have frequently been the aggressors, and have shed freely the blood of our people. Mr. K. felt that he was trespassing on the time of the Senate in vain, and that his amendment was destined to fail. He saw that his Southern friends were indifferent as to future consequences, provided they could carry out the object they had at present in view. But, if his health permitted, he could present the subject to them in such a way that they could not avoid giving it a favorable reception; and he thought he could even convince his Northern friends that the amendment was eminently calculated to preserve the race for which they expressed so much sympathy. Like many men, however, he feared that their practice did not accord with their professions. Where were their Indians? Gone, sir; destroyed—rooted out from the face of the earth; and yet they come here and talk about the oppressions of the South. Look, said Mr. K. at our tribes, the Creeks, the Cherokees, and the Chickasaws. Are they trampled down—exterminated? No, sir; they are powerful tribes. We have placed them in a fine, fertile country; the finest country that the sun shines on; with an abundance of navigable streams for their use when they become civilized enough to use them, and parts of it abounding in game for those who are not yet far enough advanced to live by agricultural pursuits. He wished gentlemen would turn their eyes to the Indians of their own country, and, weighing what has been done towards them with what has been done with the Southern tribes, strike the balance.

If the wild Indians of the Northwest are to be removed, he would ask the honorable Senator from Indiana where they are to be placed. The Senator was well acquainted with the whole Indian country—the quality of its soil, and its capacity to support an Indian population. He would ask him then were these wild Indians are to be placed, and by him to consider what will be the consequences to his proposed confederation, as well as to the neighboring whites, of crowding in the circumscribed limits of the Territory, a number of lawless savages, too wild and uncivilized to support themselves by the fruits of the earth. Mr. K. went on in continuation of his remarks, offering various reasons in support of his amendment.

Mr. TIPTON said the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] in defending his amendment, calls on me for the reasons which induce me to oppose it; and asks if my opposition does not arise out of a desire to leave room for the formation of a State north of the State of Missouri, and west of the Mississippi river?

In answer, the honorable Senator is informed that I have several reasons for opposing the amendment which he has proposed.

His amendment proposes to set apart all the country west of the Mississippi river, east of the Rocky mountains, and north of the State of Missouri, to the Canada line, excepting that to which the Indian title has been extinguished, for an additional Indian Territory, to be appropriated exclusively to the use of the Indians.

I doubt whether the honorable member has examined the maps of that portion of the United States territory, to ascertain the immense extent of country to be included within his proposed Indian Territory. Why, sir, it is large enough for a kingdom! According to the best maps, it is, in comparison to the country comprised in the twenty-six States and two Territories, as 11 is to 17½, or, it is about two-thirds as large as the whole twenty-six States and two Territories.

The United States and Territories are computed to contain 954,720 square miles. When the last census was taken, the population of the United States was 12,796,649; say that it is at this time, in round numbers, 13,000,000. If the quantity of land within the United States and Territories were equally divided among the people it would give to each soul about forty-seven acres.

The whole number of Indians east of the Rocky mountains is estimated at 233,000; the number within the mountains is reckoned at 20,000, and that west of the mountains at 80,000; in all, within the United States dominions, 333,000.

The country embraced in the amendment, including that described in the bill, contains about 636,000 square miles, equal to 407,040,000 acres. This, divided among the Indian population within the district, would give to each more than 1,746 acres, which would be thirty-seven times as much as belongs to each person in the United States; or, take the Senator's amendment, exclusive of the country and the Indians embraced in the bill, and the following will be the result:

The territory embraced by the bill contains about 76,800,000 acres, on which it proposes to locate ultimately 133,883 Indians, giving about 573¼ acres to each. This leaves within the exclusive operations of the amendment 330,547,200 acres, and less than 100,000 souls; say, in round numbers, 100,000. This would give to each person about 3,305½ acres, or seventy times as much as belongs to each person in the United States.

If, however, the Senator designs by his amendment to include only the lands between the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and north to our northern boundary, still the proportion of land to each will be about the same as that of the last calculation. It is not pretended that these calculations are fractionally precise, but they do, I feel confident, approximate the truth.

We, who advocate this bill, as reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, are charged by the Senator with crowding the Indians into a compass too small for their convenience.

When I addressed the Senate on this subject a few days ago, I showed that, according to the provisions of the bill, we were allowing to each individual, who would ultimately be located in the Territory, twenty-one times as much land as belonged to each person within the State of Ohio. Is not this enough? Is the committee, I ask, obnoxious to the charge now brought forward by the mover of the amendment, which is the subject of debate? I think not.

Another reason why I oppose his amendment is, because he proposes what would effectually check the growing power of the Western country, and of the nation. I do not charge the honorable Senator with moving the amendment with that object in view; but I do say that, if adopted, it will have that effect. I am confident he neither intends nor wishes to produce such a result. He is a statesman of too much experience, and indulges more comprehensive views. If he will reflect on this subject, he will perceive that my apprehensions respecting the effect of his amendment, are correct. With this evil in prospect, while he proposes to give his Indians seventy times as much land as belongs to each person within the United States at this time, I think I may be pardoned for objecting to his amendment.

The Sioux tribe is at present spread over and claims the country from Prairie du Chien, up the St. Peters river, and westward across the vast prairies, to the Missouri river. Their number is stated to be 21,000 souls. The Chippewas, less numerous, are spread over the head waters of the Mississippi, along the southern shores of Lake Superior, and north of that lake within the British province of Upper Canada, extending westward a considerable distance. Every one knows something of the unbounded influence which foreign agents have ever wielded over these Northern tribes. A rupture with Great Britain is invariably a war with our Indian neighbors. It is now a time of profound peace in that quarter, and we should embrace the opportunity of taking such steps as would preserve this blessing.

The country now in possession of these Northern Indians, about the sources of the Mississippi, abounds with lakes of various dimensions, filled with the finest fish in the world. Fish, and the wild rice which abounds on the Fox, and many other rivers of the North, constitute the chief articles of food of these people. On the approach of white settlers, with domestic animals, the wild rice will rapidly disappear. That means of support failing, other means must be resorted to. Then it will be wise in us, and kind towards them, to induce them to remove to a more southern and mild climate, and become agriculturalists on a more favorable soil. We have a country every way suited to that object, situated southwest of the Missouri river, and north of the Great Platte, and extending up towards the Yellow Stone river. Here is room for the organization of another Territory, if it should become necessary. It is true the bill provides for including all the Indians south of Puncah river; but the principal reason for including any country north of the Platte was to afford the Ottoes, Omahas, and Pawnees, an immediate opportunity of participating in the advantages of the Territory, which we have good reason to believe they desire to do.

The bill reported by the committee of the Senate differs a little from that reported by the committee of the House on the same subject. By the bill before the House, the southern boundary of the Territory extends up Red river to the 23d degree of longitude west of the meridian of the City of Washington, thence on said line of longitude to the south fork of the river Platte; thence down said river to the Missouri river, and thence down the Missouri, and along the western boundaries of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, to the beginning. Should any Senator desire an alteration in the bill before us, making it to conform to the bill of the House, and will propose an amendment to that effect, I will consent. I view such an alteration unimportant. If made, it will reduce the quantity of land embraced in the Senate's bill, as it now reads, about 3,700,000 acres. This is too inconsiderable of itself to give rise to objection. If the altering of the bill before us, so as to make it conform to that of the House, will make it more acceptable to a single member of either House, I wish it done.

Sir, I repeat that the amendment is, in my judgment, very exceptionable, because the Territory embraced by it is disproportioned to the population which is to possess it. It will, as I have stated, allow 3,305 acres of land to every soul, which is seventy times as much as the proportion to each individual within the United States and Territories. The inhabitants would not be so compactly settled as to feel inclined to become agriculturalists. Left within a country far too large, to roam in quest of game, as it and the wild rice diminish we may expect them naturally to be impelled southward towards us, especially to spend their winters near a grain-growing country, and that they will bring with them, and communicate to our Indians, unfriendly feelings towards the people of the United States.

I am called on by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] to state whether an object I have in view, in objecting to give up to the Indians for ever the county north of the State of Missouri, and south of the St. Peters river, is not for the sake of reserving it for the purpose of forming another free State? To this I answer in the affirmative. I have many friends and acquaintances in that country west of the Mississippi river, who desire to form a State at no distant day, and I wish to gratify them. Does the honorable Senator expect to check the growing power of the Northwest? Sir, he might as well attempt to place himself at the mighty cataract where the waters of the great lakes descend from their level into the abyss below, and stay the current of the Niagara, as to attempt to prevent the emigration of the industrious, intelligent, and enterprising people from all parts of the United States to the Ioway Territory, west of the Mississippi river.

It is with great reluctance that I mention the subject of slavery, or anti-slavery, into which I am drawn by this discussion. But I may be permitted to state that I am decidedly opposed to the extension of slavery into any portion of our country, where it does not at this time exist. Although I have always voted for the right of petition, I profess to be as much opposed to disturbing the rights of our slaveholding States to this description of property, as any man south of the Ohio and Potomac. These views I declared in my place here two years ago, I need not again repeat them. I regret exceedingly to see the subject stirred by the inhabitants of the free States. Our forefathers entered into the compact with slaveholders of the South. The matter is therefore older than the Constitution. It is a part of our bargain with our friends of the slaveholding States, that their rights in this respect should be most scrupulously observed, and thus they should be observed by every patriot who appreciates our free institutions. If any one has a desire to live in a slave State, let him settle south of the compromise line of latitude—36° 30′. Or, if he prefer a free State, there is ample room north of that line, and north of the Ohio river. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, or the Far West, will gladly take them in.

The Senator, in the course of his remarks, made allusion to what I had said on a former day about exterminating the Indians of Indiana, if one of my neighbors should be killed by them. I was speaking of the dangers to be apprehended from the introduction of such papers as the remonstrance presented by my honorable friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] I was endeavoring to show that we ought to do nothing to encourage a hope in the Indians that the policy of this Government in removing, and in settling them permanently in the West, could be either arrested or altered. They who encourage such an idea are treading on dangerous ground. I was apprehensive of danger in the South, in the Senator's own State of Alabama, not in the State from which I came. In 1836 there was a rupture between the whites and the Indians in that and a neighboring State, when the Chief Magistrate of the State of Alabama found it necessary to march at the head of the militia to save the white people from a massacre. The hostile Indians retreated to their fastnesses in the swamps, and the militia and volunteers surrounded the swamps to shoot down the hostiles, as the friendly Indians, fighting in our behalf, drove them from their hiding places. If, instead of these swamps, the country had been plains or open prairies, such as we find much of the country to the Northwest, there would have been extermination. And who would have blamed the Alabamians? I should not.

Sir, I have only to add, that I am inclined to think that the honorable mover of the amendment under consideration has not examined its effects with his usual care. Viewing the subject as I do, I cannot give it my support.

Mr. SEVIER spoke at some length in favor of the amendment, commenting on the evils that would result from crowding the wild Indians of the Northwest on the more civilized tribes of the South, and the dangers that would be occasioned to the adjacent States, when, the game failing these Indians, they would be driven to desperation by want of subsistence. He thought that this was the time for those Senators who had expressed so much sympathy for the poor Indians, and talked so feelingly about removing them from the graves of their forefathers, to show their sincerity. He called upon those Senators who had been presenting memorials in favor of leaving the Indians where they are, and particularly upon the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS] who had just presented a memorial against the removal of the Cherokees, to march boldly up and toe the mark. Now was the time to show the sincerity of their professions, and that they had humanity, and not politics, in view. Here was an amendment proposing to secure to a number of tribes their own hunting grounds—the homes of their childhood, and the graves of their ancestors—and he called upon gentlemen to march boldly up and meet it. If the bill was good for the Creeks, the Cherokees, and the Chickasaws, it was good for the Sacs, Foxes, and Winnebagoes; and there was as much reason for providing for the security and protection of the one as for the other. When the first Indian bill was passed, it set out with declaring that the country without the limits of the organized States and Territories should be reserved for the Indians and their descendants forever. This was the law remaining on the statute book, and he was disposed preserve the principle it involved.

After some remarks from Mr. LINN, the debate was continued by Messrs. CALHOUN and KING in favor of the amendment, and by Messrs. DAVIS, SOUTHARD, YOUNG, and WHITE opposed to it, when the question was taken, and Mr. KING'S amendment was rejected—yeas 11, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Preston, Roane, Sevier, and Spence—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pearce, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—22.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the bill was amended, by reducing the salary of the Secretary of the Territory from fifteen hundred to one thousand dollars; and

After some further remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN, LUMPKIN, and WHITE,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 38, nays 6, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—38.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Niles, and Norvell—6.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, May 1, 1838.

WESTERN FRONTIER.

The SPEAKER, on leave, laid before the House a communication from the acting Secretary of War, transmitting copies of instructions to Maj. General Gaines, relating to the selection of sites for military posts on the western frontier of Ar-Arkansas and Missouri.

On motion of Mr. YELL, laid on the table.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. CAMBRELENG presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating the condition of the Treasury on the 30th ult. by which it appears that the amount of available means was about 900,000 dollars, being, as Mr. C. stated, about 600,000 dollars less than the amount stated in a previous communication from the Secretary, of the 23d ult. Mr. C's object in submitting the communication, was to show the House the urgent necessity of a speedy action on the financial measure which had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. The reduction of the revenue was owing exclusively to the premature redemption of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued under the act of October last.

The following is a copy of the communication:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
April 30, 1838.

I transmit for the information of the Committee of Ways and Means, the enclosed statement, marked

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

[Mr. HARPER presented the petition of Samuel Fish of Muskingum county, Ohio: referred to the Committee of Claims.]

Petitions and memorials of a private nature were also, on leave, presented by Messrs. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, HARPER, JONES of Wisconsin, LINCOLN, MONTGOMERY, WILLIAMS of Tennessee, and CAMPBELL of Tennessee.

The following resolutions were, on leave, submitted, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PRATT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from the Lexington post office, to Westkill post office, all in the county of Green, and State of New York.

On motion of Mr. H. JOHNSON of Louisiana,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to this House a copy of the report of Major Bellknap, of the 3d regiment of infantry, with respect to the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of the Sabine river.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER of Ohio,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War lay before this House the report and survey of the harbor of Sandusky, made by Lieut. Campbell Graham, in the year 1826.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Iola to St. Joseph, in Florida, on the railroad track between those places.

THE LATE DUEL.

The House resumed the unfinished business, being the consideration of the report of the select committee appointed to inquire into the causes which led to the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY.

The question was on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to recommit "what purported to be" the report of the select committee, with instructions to strike out the argumentative part thereof, and report only the evidence, and also to recommit the motion to print.

The pending motion was that of Mr. DUNCAN to strike out the words in italics.

Mr. ADAMS, in reference to Mr. THOMAS's statement of last night, (as given above,) admitted its correctness, viz: that the majority report of the Bank investigating committee; but he complained that in the case before the House, nothing appeared on the journal of the committee that the report was adopted there by a majority.

Mr. A. accepted Mr. DUNCAN'S amendment as a modification of his instructions.

Mr. REED complained of the misrepresentations sent abroad of the course pursued by him and his friends. Though in favor of recommitting the partial report, he was not opposed to the publication of the facts.

Mr. MERCER called for a further division of the question.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Vermont, moved an additional amendment as follows: "and that the petitions upon the subject of duelling, heretofore referred to the committee by this House, be recommitted to the committee; and said committee are hereby directed to report thereon to this House."

Mr. F. said he was induced to move this amendment, for the purpose of bringing distinctly before the House for their action the memorials and petitions which had been received and referred to this committee. He understood that upwards of one hundred memorials and petitions upon this subject, signed by some fifteen or twenty thousand citizens, had been presented and referred to this committee for their consideration. It appeared to him that these memorials should receive some consideration, and that they should be reported upon; that it was an act of justice due to the memorialists, and a duty devolving upon the House. The doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] on a former occasion, was, that the right of petition was sacred; that it involved the duty of the House to hear, examine, and report upon the same. Now Mr. F. insisted that the committee should not be discharged from this duty.

The SPEAKER suggested to the gentleman that the instructions referred to the petitions, and that those who voted for the instructions of course relieved the committee from the petitions

Mr. FLETCHER replied, that if that was the onstruction, the House would take the responsicbiliy upon itself, and he would therefore withdraw his amendment.

After some conversation between the CHAIR and Messrs. BOON, ELMORE, PETRIKIN, BRONSON, and MERCER, as to the position of the question under the various divisions called for,

Mr. THOMAS moved to strike out the latter branch of the instructions.

[This was to discharge the committee from the further consideration of that part of the original resolution of 22d February, directing them to inquire into and report if any breach of privilege had been committed.]

Mr. THOMAS feared that the House were about to take a step, which, instead of extricating, would involve us in still further embarrassments. We have for several days been engaged in a discussion to determine whether this committee have exceeded their powers. There is much contrariety of opinion as to the effect of the original resolution under which the committee was organized, and of the repeated orders of the House referring various petitions, which have been committed. And now, sir, with a full knowledge of this, what are we about to do? The gentleman from Massachusetts has moved to commit this report, with certain instructions. Of this motion a division has been called for; and the sense of the House will be first taken on the motion to commit, and then the House will proceed to vote upon the instructions proposed. In this mode of proceeding no inconvenience would be encountered, if all who vote to commit, would then vote together, as to the instructions to be given. But is it reasonable to anticipate such a state of things? Can it be doubted but that many will vote to commit who will not be united as to the nature of the instructions to be given? And may it not happen that the report will be recommitted, and yet a majority of the House be found unwilling to modify the original resolution under which the committee were appointed, or to discharge the committee from the consideration of the petitions that have been referred? In that event, we shall have the members of the committee in the same position in which they have been placed. They will be required to determine upon the extent of their powers; and the House will again be engaged in ten days' discussion to determine whether the committee have or have not exceeded the authority granted. It is time for this House to take the proper responsibility. For one, he had been prepared from the moment that this subject was introduced, to vote, directly and unequivocally, upon all the questions which have arisen. It is due to the committee that the whole House should act with candor and distinctness. Let us say what the committee are to do before we instruct them to take charge again of these delicate questions. Let us say whether they shall, or shall not, report upon the question whether a breach of the privileges of this House has been committed, or not. And let us say whether the committee shall, or shall not, present to the House measures of redress for any grievance which they may think exists. When this has been done, the House will have discharged its duty. Without this we shall have avoided, we shall not have decided, those questions, in the discussion of which we have been occupied, to the exclusion of all other business, for more than a week. We shall have evaded responsibility, and have devolved the whole upon the members of the committee. This, Mr. T. was not prepared to do. He had formed opinions upon these questions; he was prepared to spread them upon the records of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ELMORE expressed his assent to this amendment.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays upon it; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS briefly opposed this motion, and expressed himself at a loss to perceive what further relief it could afford the committee.

Mr. MAY then moved an adjournment.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RIVES suggested that, in consequence of the confusion incident upon so many propositions to amend, it would be better to adjourn, so that they might be postponed till to-morrow.

The House refused to adjourn—yeas 7, nays 156.

The question was then taken on Mr. THOMAS's amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 68.

The question then recurred on the remaining branch of the instructions, to recommit with instructions to report the evidence only, being the original motion of Mr. ADAMS, on which a division had been called for; first on the motion to recommit, and then on the instructions.

Mr. RARIDEN moved a substitute, viz: that the report of the majority and views of the minority, together with the journal and evidence, be recommitted, with instructions to arrange the journal, evidence, and the questions propounded, whether overruled by the majority or not; and that they report the same to the House without comments or arguments.

Mr. TOUCEY called for the yeas and nays on the proposition, which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS questioned the motion of Mr. R. being in order.

The CHAIR decided that it was; but after some further conversation—

Mr. RARIDEN withdrew it for the present, and the question recurred as before.

Mr. THOMAS, in order to test the sense of the House, moved to strike out the balance of the instructions.

Mr. BOON inquired, what would be the effect of a motion to lay these several motions on the table?

The CHAIR replied, that it would lay the whole subject on the table, as the report, &c. would cohere.

Some conversation then took place between Messrs. MERCER, ELMORE, TOUCEY, and ADAMS, as to the situation of the bill to prevent duelling; Mr. ELMORE stating that the committee had agreed to some amendments, and Mr. TOUCEY that he was ready to report it, the amendments having been agreed to unanimously.

Mr. ADAMS accepted Mr. RARIDEN'S proposition as a modification of his own, and adding a further instruction to the committee to report the anti-duelling bill.

Mr. LEGARE dissented from it on the ground of irregularity in calling for the journal of a committee, and the inutility of requiring any action of the House upon it. Mr. L. called for a division of the question.

Mr. THOMAS expressed his adherence to his motion to strike out the instructions, for he was opposed to any instructions further than contained in the original resolution of the House.

Mr. BELL went, at length, into a course of argument against the report of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERS made some remarks in support of the necessity of the journal of the committee of this character forming part of the report, for as the House had to decide upon the testimony, the journal was indispensably necessary for them to judge of the admissibility or rejection of evidence, the impartiality of calling and examining witnesses, &c. He commented upon the proceeding as a party measure; but he hoped party feeling would pass away, and that the vote upon the question of privilege would be given, with a simple reference to the rights and dignity of the House, and of some of its members. With this view, he trusted the evidence would be reported with the journal, that the House might judge whether any evidence had been excluded, which ought to be in possession of the House. He referred to the circumstance that few of the members, manifestly not a quorum, were in their seats, and hoped the power of the House would not be exerted on this occasion. The business he thought too important to be ac'ed on by a mere quorum, and he was disposed to be good-natured, and take things as they are, and hoped the House would agree with him. He therefore moved an adjournment.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn at the request of

Mr. WILLIAMS, who moved a reconsideration of the vote by which, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, a part of the instructions had been stricken from the resolution of Mr. ADAMS; which motion having been entered,

Mr. BOONE rose to a question of order, and desired it to be ascertained if a quorum was present.

The SPEAKER, after counting, said that 105 members were present—not a quorum.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House.

Mr. ELMORE requested that it might be withdrawn, to allow him to make an explanation.

Mr. BELL hoped the House would adjourn. It was ungenerous to go on in the present state of the House.

Mr. CHAMBERS renewed his motion to adjourn, which had precedence of the motion to call the House.

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the vote was carried in the negative—ayes 60, noes 68.

Mr. ADAMS said, as by the vote there appeared to be a quorum present, he should withdraw his motion for a call of the House, and was proceeding with some remarks upon the motion to reconsider, when

Mr. McKENNAN moved an adjournment, but withdrew it for a moment to allow

Mr. TOUCEY to report the bill from the Senate "to prevent the giving or receiving a challenge in the District of Columbia, and for the punishment of the same," with an amendment; which was, by unanimous consent, received, referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

After some conversation,

Mr. McKENNAN renewed his motion to adjourn.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. McKENNAN said it was not his purpose to fatigue the House with calling the yeas and nays, and he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. YELL suggested, that as no vote ought to be take on the subject before the House, it might be laid on the table for the present, and the House could proceed with some other business. And he moved to lay the subject on the table, and take up the army bill.

Some conversation ensued upon this motion; when,

Mr. GRAHAM moved an adjournment.

Mr. YELL called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and by a vote of yeas 78, nays 56,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, May 1, 1838.

The Senate adjourned at an early hour, without transacting any business save of a private nature.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1838.

Mr. PETRIKIN, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, relative to the sufferers of the Wyoming Valley; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Hampshire presented a petition from Horace Duncan and others for the establishment of a mail route from Haverhill, New Hampshire, to Lancaster, New Hampshire, via North Lyman

THE LATE DUEL.

The House resumed the unfinished business being the consideration of the report from the select committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, to reconsider the vote, by which the House rejected the latter branch of Mr. ADAMS's instructions, discharging the committee from the consideration of the question of breach of privilege, and from the memorials on the subject of the duel.

Mr. CONNOR moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and proceeded in till 175 members responded, when

Mr. MORGAN moved that it be dispensed with.

Mr. WISE hoped the House would persist in calling his judges, so that there might be a full bench, for he had no idea of the races taking his judges off the bench.

The motion was rejected, the call further proceeded in, and excuses rendered for several absentees; when

Mr. DAVIS made an ineffectual motion to dispense with the call; and it was further proceeded in, with closed doors, till the roll was nearly called through, and 180 members were ascertained to be present; when

Mr. MITCHELL moved to dispense with its further proceedings; which was agreed to—ayes 74, noes 44.

The question then recurring on the motion to reconsider, and the yeas and nays being ordered, after some remarks from Messrs. TILLINGHAST, MERCER, POPE, and McKENNAN,

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew the motion at the request of the latter, to enable him [Mr. McKENNAN] to submit three distinct propositions:

1. To recommit the report, evidence, and other papers, with instructions to report nothing more than the evidence by them taken, and such parts of the journal as would show what evidence was offered and excluded.

2. That in consideration the House had not heretofore proceeded against any one in the numerous duels that had taken place, it would not be just to do so in this instance; but declaring that, hereafter, challenging a member for language spoken in debate, is a violation of the privileges of the House.

3. Discharging the committee from the further consideration of the original resolution, and memorials, on duelling, except so far as ordered by the first resolution.

The question, however, was on the first branch of Mr. ADAMS's instructions, requiring the committee to report only the evidence and journal.

Mr. ADAMS earnestly advocated the propriety of his own motion, and condemned, with great severity, the course of the committee, and designated the whole proceeding as an Administration measure.

Mr. THOMAS, for himself, gave this statement a most unqualified denial, and disclaimed it in toto. He called upon the gentleman to give the evidence of his assertion.

Mr. ADAMS referred to the journal of the votes as evidence of the fact.

Mr. THOMAS referred to his vote against receiving the petitions calling for the expulsion of members by name, and explained his object in the motions made by him in reference to the report.

[There was much angry feeling exhibited: Mr. ADAMS reiterating his charge with great warmth, and Mr. THOMAS repelling it. The debate will be given hereafter.]

Mr. ADAMS explained the object of his motion to recommit to be, to strip the report of much exciting and excitable debating matter, and relieve the House from it. He insisted that the petitions did not justify the committee in selecting a few of the individuals implicated, or that they were of that character which demanded action, because they did not come from those most interested in the question—the constituents of those members.

Mr. McKENNAN, for the purpose of not embarrassing the question, or opening a wider field, withdrew his proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky then renewed his motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the second branch of Mr. ADAMS's instructions.

Mr. THOMAS then replied to the charge brought by Mr. ADAMS, of making the Administration responsible for this proceeding.

Mr. BOON said, when the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] under a general assault upon the Administration, uttered what he knew to be destitute of any foundation whatever, he took the liberty, as he had an undoubted right to do, of calling the gentleman to order; and this, said Mr. B. threw that member into a fit of frenzy, and has drawn from him a train of ill-natured personal allusions towards myself. The member from Massachusetts has, in his great zeal to promote party purposes, declared, without qualification, that this is an Administration measure; and for this, sir, I called the gentleman to order; whereupon he was most graciously pleased to except myself from the application of his declaration, and, by way of retort, said that my votes would show that I was not influenced by party considerations. Sir, continued Mr. B. it is a difficult question to settle as to what party the gentleman from Massachusetts belongs, for it is, I believe, generally admitted that in politics he is a perfect nondescript.

The CHAIR reminded Mr. B. that it was not in order to make any personal allusions to a member in debate.

Mr. BOON said he could not reply to the remarks of that gentleman in order, who was notoriously known to be out of order whenever he addressed the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if my votes are to be considered as an unerring test of my fealty to the Administration, it will be seen that the gentleman from Massachusetts is sometimes found voting as I do; and I am free to declare, that whenever such happens to be the case, I have, on all occasions of the kind, seriously doubted the correctness of my vote. Sir, on a former occasion, I declared as I now do, that I was a party man for principle, and that I would sustain the Administration in all its rightful measures; but when any measure shall be proposed by the Administration, of which I may disapprove, I will exercise my own judgment, independent of the Administration. It has been my fortune to differ on some points with some of my political friends, and for which I feel exceedingly sorry. But so it is, and so it must be. Why, sir, it so happened that the member from Massachusetts and myself voted in favor of the appointment of the select committee, to inquire and report upon the subjects referred to them; but now that the committee have labored full two months in the faithful discharge of their duty to their God, to this House, and to the country, the member from Massachusetts is for kicking the report of the committee out of the House, as an Administration measure! Sir, allow me to say that none other than one possessing a heart overflowing with the most malignant party feelings could be capable of making the unfounded charge made by the member from Massachusetts—that this is an Administration measure. The gentleman would, if he could, create the belief that he is quite anxious to save the time of this House, and to prevent discussion on this subject. How far the gentleman's professions accord with his acts, in reference to this matter, may be seen by turning your eyes to the clock, and observe how much of the time of the House that member has consumed from the reading of the journal till the few minutes which were occupied in a brief reply by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] who has just taken his seat. Sir, if the gentleman be really sincere in his professions about the saving of time, let him give the proof thereof, by marching up to the question at once, and voting directly upon the resolutions reported by the committee. I, for one, said Mr. B. am ready and willing to meet the question now or at any time; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts, and those who act with him, will but meet the question at once, there will be an end of the matter. I am for no staving-off. To use the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts some two or three years since, let there no dodging the question, as he then charged upon another body, in another quarter of this Capitol, when the war question with France was under consideration, and when that gentleman made a speech on both sides of that question.

Mr. MURRAY then moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. POTTS asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 47, nays 124.

So the House refused to lay it on the table.

Mr. ELMORE had hoped that what he had said in explanation of his views of duty, and in expressing his desire to have explicit instructions given to the committee, had been understood by the House, but it appeared to him to have been otherwise; and he went on at large to urge the House to say, distinctly, what was desired by the House in the recommitment.

He contended that the House had, by its original resolution instructed him to perform a duty which was most painful, and he called upon the House, if they did not desire the performance of that duty, to discharge the committee from the order, in direct terms. There were doubts existing in relation to the condition in which the committee would be found under the instructions as now proposed to the House. He was pleased with the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] because it proposed to discharge the committee from a most painful and delicate duty; and he had expressed his satisfaction, when the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] moved to strike out that clause; not because he wished the duty left upon the committee, but because he should obtain the clear expression of the views of the House. He would shrink from no duty the House might impose upon him; but if they intended to relieve the committee from the responsibility of reporting upon the question of a breach of privilege, he wished that it might be so done that there could be no misunderstanding on the part of the committee or any member of the House.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider, and decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 90.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. THOMAS, to strike out that clause of the instructions of Mr. ADAMS, which directed the committee to arrange the testimony, and such parts of the journal as would show what testimony had been offered and rejected by the committee, without any comment thereon.

The question being taken by yeas and nays was decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 93.

Mr. LOOMIS moved to strike out a part of the clause just decided to be retained, but it was voted by the Speaker to be out of order.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont then moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto, "that the petitions and memorials heretofore presented to the House upon the subject of duelling, be recommitted to the committee, and that they be required to report upon the same.

Mr. F. remarked that he wished the whole subject to go together, and to have a report upon the whole, without having reports in details. He did not wish the House to lose sight of the petitions and memorials.

Mr. MERCER suggested that the memorials had been reported on, by the report already made.

Mr. FLETCHER said he knew they had reported, but that report would not be sent back, and he wished it sent back with the petitions and memorials, that the whole matter might be acted on together.

Mr. ADAMS said he should vote against the motion to amend, for the reasons that he considered the Senate bill, reported by the committee, as a report upon the memorials; and because, if the committee were to examine the memorials and the various prayers contained in them, it would occupy many months, and would re-open all the ground already gone over.

Mr. FLETCHER contended that the right of petition involved the right to have the memorials examined by the committee, and he was desirous that the various prayers contained therein should be reported upon.

Mr. SLADE said he was in favor of the amendment of his colleague, and should be glad to vote for it; but he could not do so without a further amendment. He suggested to amend the amendment, by adding, "that the committee report any testimony they may take in relation to the memorials, without comment."

Mr. FLETCHER declined to accept the modification. He said he had not known any parliamentary usage in accordance with it. Petitions were referred to committees generally, and he could not consent that this committee should be restricted.

Mr. SLADE remarked that he wished to have the committee restricted in their investigation of the motion, as they were in relation to other parts of the investigation, and he moved to amend the amendment as he had suggested. He did not wish the committee to go over the whole ground, and again to comment and argue upon the merits of the testimony brought before them.

The SPEAKER, in answer to an inquiry of a member, stated that the effect of the previous question would be upon the passage of the resolutions reported by the committee.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was rejected—yeas 63, nays 83

Mr. FLETCHER called for the yeas and nays on his amendment; which were ordered, and the question being taken, the amendment was adopted—yeas 89, nays 86.

Mr. LOOMIS said the Committee were required by the original resolution, and by the prayer of the memorials, to report upon the subject of a breach of privilege, and he moved to insert after the words "without comment or arguments," the words "except as to the question of a breach of privilege."

Mr. NAYLOR urged the propriety of caution on the part of the House, and protested against exercising the power of judging of breaches of privilege through the action of a committee.

Mr. FAIRFIELD called for the ayes and noes on the motion of Mr. LOOMIS, and they were ordered.

Mr. LEGARE urged the House not to act precipitately, and pressed the propriety of an adjournment which he moved.

The ayes and noes having been ordered on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative—ayes 88, noes 97.

Mr. REED moved to amend the amendment of Mr. LOOMIS, by adding at the end of it the words, "and if a member prove to be involved, they shall not proceed against him, but shall make a special report of that fact to the House."

Mr. R. remarked, that his object was to avoid such embarrassment as the House had found itself involved in, in consequence of not adhering to this rule of the Manual.

Mr. MALLORY called for an adjournment.

Mr. GRANT called for the yeas and nays; which being taken, the motion was decided in the negative—ayes 88, noes 89, the CHAIR voting in the negative.

Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS then moved a call of the House; but before taking the question thereon,

Mr. RUSSELL moved that the House do now adjourn; which question being taken by ayes and noes, was decided in the negative—ayes 88, noes 97.

The question then recurred on the motion for a call of the House; which having been ordered to be taken by ayes and noes, was decided in the negative—ayes 74, noes 99.

And then, on motion,

The House adjourned.

sition to the motion, it was rejected, and the bill was passed without a division.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 3, 1838.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Second Auditor, according to the provisions of the act of the 6th of May, 1822, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontier.

On motion of Mr. BELL, laid on the table.

Mr. BELL moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of submitting a resolution for the adjournment of the House over to Monday, for the purpose of ventilating and purifying the hall, taking up the old carpets, putting down the spring matting, and other necessary alterations, which could not be done while the House met from day to day.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would not object, but under the circumstances in which the public business was, he could not consent to it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and on dividing by tellers, the vote was—ayes 85, noes 32.

Mr. YELL renewed the call for the yeas and nays, but they were again refused, and the motion to suspend was agreed to—ayes 114, noes 36, and the question being on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WISE inquired if Sunday was a legislative day.

The CHAIR replied that the construction given to the rule against adjourning over more than three days did not include Sundays.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved to amend the motion, by providing that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday, and the same motion for Thursday next week, but it was disagreed to.

The resolution of Mr. BELL was then agreed to without a division.

Mr. BELL announced to the House that it would be impossible to comply with this order unless they adjourned forthwith, and he accordingly made that motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that if it was the design of the House, on Monday, to go on with the public business, and it was generally understood that they would do so, he presumed there would be no objection to the gentleman's motion; but if it was not so designed, he should feel compelled to oppose the motion. He hoped, however, it would be understood, by general consent, that they would go on with the public business on that day.

Mr. WISE gave notice to the gentleman from New York, and the whole House, that it would not be with his consent.

Mr. BELL said it had been suggested to him that certain Senate bills were on the Speaker's table, which might be committed, and he had no objection to that course; for that purpose he would withdraw the motion.

The following bills were then read twice, and referred to their appropriate committees:

Bill to grant to the States, and incorporated companies, engaged in the construction of roads or canals, the right of way through the public lands of the United States.

Bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant, and other, Indians, west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following messages from the President of the United States, received this day:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The report of the Secretary of War, transmitted by me to the House of Representatives, in compliance with their resolution of the 16th ult. respecting an attack alleged to have been made by a Mexican armed vessel upon an American steamboat, having stated that no information on the subject had at that time reached the Department, I now transmit another report from the same officer, communicating a copy of a note from the Mexican Minister, with an accompanying document, in reference to the act alluded to, which have been received at the Department since the date of the former report.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 2d May, 1838.

The following are the papers which were transmitted by the President, under cover of a communication from the Secretary of State:

Mr. Martinez to Mr. Forsyth.

MEXICAN LEGATION,
New Orleans, April 20, 1838.

SIR: Whilst the notices of an insult pretended to have been committed against the flag of the United States, in the waters of Texas, by the Mexican brig of war Iturbide, were confined to the public newspapers, and I had no documents by means of which I could repel this calumny, I abstained from addressing you on the subject. But as, according to the papers, the attention of the honorable chamber of Senators of the Congress of the Union has been directed towards the charges published against Mexico, by the passengers of the steamboat Columbia, and I am in possession of an official statement from the commander of the said brig relating to the occurrence with the said boat, I have the honor to send you, sir, the annexed extract from that document, with the hope that you will submit it to the notice of his excellency the President. The captain of the Columbia, and not the captain of the Iturbide, as will be here seen, provoked the attack to which this note refers, and the former should, therefore, be responsible for the result, whatever it may be.

Permit me, sir, to repeat to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

FRANCIS PIZARRO MARTINEZ.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of State of the United States.

[TRANSLATION OF THE ENCLOSURE.]

Extract from the official communication of the commander of the Mexican brig of war Iturbide, respecting her encounter with the steamboat Columbia.

To the Commandant General of the Mexican squadron:

BRIG ITURBIDE, under sail, in latitude 29° 6′ longitude 88° 48′, west of Cadiz, five o'clock in the afternoon of this day, March 24, 1838.

At the moment when you, sir, announced, by your signals, that you saw sails in the third quarter, I made out the vessel to be a steamboat, coming from the north, and I discovered that she was not the same to which we had given chase this morning, and which was apparently on her way to Brazoria, as this boat has two chimneys, and the other only one. As soon as you gave the signal for chase with all speed, and without our closing, (sin subjecion á famacion,) I endeavored by a press of sail to cut her off, steering southeast, clearing away to be ready for action, and taking the other precautions; but on seeing that she was bearing down on my starboard bow, I ordered all my men to take their proper fire and cutting arms, to be ready for an attempt to board. While we were thus sailing towards each other, as you saw, our distance was necessarily becoming less, and seeing that her stern flag was that of the United States, I hoisted mine with a pendant, and fired a gun without ball. I clewed up my mainsail in order that she should stop her engine for me to examine her; but this was not done; and as, on the contrary, her movements towards me were very suspicious, I ordered another gun to be fired, with ball, in a direction very wide of the steamboat, which was done as a notice for her to stop. Instead of doing so, however, she continued on her course, as if with a view of getting past me to the leeward. When I got within speaking distance, I hailed her three times with a trumpet, and she did not design to give any reply to either call. On the fourth call, an individual answered, loading me with abuse, and telling me if I wanted to see his papers, I should come on board his boat. All this was spoken without the speaking trumpet; and although he was called on to stop, in order that his papers and his boat should be visited, he did not do so, but, on the other hand, continued to insult my political insignia by the grossest obscenities and language.

In consequence of the proceedings, I fired two cannon and three muskets, not aimed at the steamer, for the purpose of intimidating her, that she should do as required. She, however, took no notice of it, but continued on her way, letting off her steam, which was very high, so near me, that the ashes and some warm water fell on board of my vessel.

"God and Liberty!"

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, in answer to that part of this resolution of the 19th ultimo, requesting the communication of all correspondence with any foreign Government, in regard to the title or occupation of the territory of the United States beyond the Rocky Mountains.

(Signed) M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, April 30, 1838.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, postponed till Thursday next.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report and accompanying documents from the Acting Secretary of War, which contains the information required by the resolution of the 16th ultimo, respecting the officers of the Corps of Engineers, the works upon which they were engaged during the last year, and the other matters embraced in the resolution.

Washington, May 1, 1838. M. VAN BUREN.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to refund to the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company certain duties upon railroad iron imported by them; which was committed to a Committee on the Union.

Mr. BELL would say to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that so far as the public business could be expedited by his vote, or otherwise, he would do it cheerfully. Mr. B. then renewed the motion to adjourn.

Mr. YELL called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and Mr. BELL's motion prevailing without a division, the House adjourned.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to strike out "a select committee, &c," and insert the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads;" which was agreed to.

Mr. M'KAY moved further to amend the resolution, by striking therefrom, all after the words "United States," so as to leave the matter open generally for contracts with all railroad companies.

Mr. GRAY accepted this amendment, and so modified, the resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HAYNES asked leave to offer the following, but Mr. YELL objected to it.

Whereas, each of the States of this Union has a right to participate in the public lands, the common fund for their use and benefit according to their use and benefit, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure;

Resolved, That, as the public lands constitute a revenue fund subject to the said principle of distribution, and, as taxes are levied upon the people and not upon the States as such, that any distribution which may be made of those lands, should be made among the citizens of the several States and Territories of the Union, according to the principle by which direct taxes are regulated by the Constitution; and that a select committee be appointed, with instructions to report a bill making an apportionment of all the public lands of the United States among the citizens of the several States and Territories, according to the ratio by which direct taxes are apportioned among them.

The CHAIR announced the unfinished business, being the consideration of the report of the Select Committee on the death of Mr. CILLEY; when

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose and said he hoped the House would consent to-day, agreeably to the understanding on Thursday last, to go on with the public business, which the House, and every member of it, must be aware was very important and of pressing urgency.

Mr. ADAMS objected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of submitting the following order:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended for the purpose of considering bills referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MENEFEE inquired if it was in order to assign reasons against this motion.

The CHAIR replied that, under the rules, the motion was not debatable.

Mr. GRAVES protested against the unfinished business, in which he was affected, being laid aside.

Mr. HUNTER, of Ohio, asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 112, nays 57.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then asked leave to submit the following:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be suspended for the purpose of considering the Treasury Note bill.

Objection being made, Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rule to enable him to offer the above, and said that, in the present condition of the Treasury of the country, he felt compelled to ask for the yeas and nays, which he did, and they were ordered, and were yeas 102, nays 77.

So the House again refused to suspend, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

DUELLING REPORT.

Mr. SAWYER then rose and said that he should make a motion which would put gentlemen to the test whether they would do that directly which they sought to do indirectly; and it was to lay the whole subject on the table.

The condition, said Mr. S. in which the House was involved, had only served to bring the conviction upon his mind of the utter folly of proceeding with the subject any further. What mighty result was to be accomplished? What great principle was to be established? Where was it to terminate? These were considerations that should, he thought, address themselves to every member there, for as it was progressing, the subject was as boundless as space. He implored gentlemen, therefore, to pause, and reflect upon what an extraordinary spectacle they were presenting to the eyes of the American nation. The whole country was laboring under deep excitement, and the public mind was absolutely sick in the anxious expectation that this body would do something for its relief; and they had now been in session upwards of five months, without making any progress or advancing one step in affording the relief asked. And here was the House engaged in an idle pursuit, in a wild crusade, after the lost rights of the members. He would say that this whole proceeding, from beginning to end, was irregular; and he admonished gentlemen that, if they persisted in pursuing this matter, he should feel compelled to introduce a resolution directing the select committee to report a recision of the original resolution.

Mr. S. concluded by expressing his sincere thanks to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] for the noble and dignified stand he had taken on this occasion. That gentleman had shown himself not only the advocate of members on that floor, but the advocate of popular rights generally. Mr. S. said he proposed, in a spirit of frankness, in a spirit of peace, and for the purpose of expelling from that hall the demon of discord, to lay the whole subject on the table; and, on that motion, he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. GRANTLAND hoped the gentleman would not press that motion; and as he wished an opportunity of stating his reasons against it, he begged to be allowed to do so.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that the motion was not debatable.

Mr. RUMSEY inquired if, should the subject be laid on the table, it would require two thirds to call it up?

The CHAIR said that, as it was a privileged question, a bare majority would be sufficient, when it was reached.

Mr. GRANTLAND inquired if the motion to print could be coupled with that to lay on the table?

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to lay the subject on the table—yeas 48, nays 131.

The subject was then announced from the Chair.

The question was on the motion of Mr. TOUCEY, under the direction of the committee, to print the report and testimony, with the substitute of Mr. ADAMS, to recommit with certain instructions, to report the facts, "without comments or arguments;" to which Mr. LOOMIS moved the following amendment: "except as to the question of a breach of privilege;" and Mr. REED the following to the amendment: "and if a member prove to be involved, they shall not proceed against him, but shall make a special report of that fact to the House."

Mr. RARIDAN said the resolution, with instructions, as then pending, would place the subject before the committee in its original situation. He would not take the ground that the committee was not authorized to make an investigation. He had been opposed to the argument, but in making an investigation, and coming to a conclusion, he thought they were correct, and ought to intimate to the House the course which they thought ought to be pursued. But whether there was a breach of privilege, or not, was a question of law, under the rules of the House; and he could not see what course could have been pursued by the committee, except to take the testimony, and form a conclusion. He thought the intention of the House was to instruct the committee to inquire; and having inquired, and having come to a conclusion upon the question of a breach of privilege, were they to keep that conclusion in their own breasts? The committee could not cause a member to be arrested and put upon trial, but they were instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the death of Mr. CILLEY. The evidence was properly taken and was properly before the House. He hoped the House would take the evidence, and let all the rest pass as a work of supererogation. He had formed conclusions in his own mind, which he had laid before the House in writing, with the hope that it would be printed and go before the country. However much he wished to have the subject disposed of, he did not wish that the House should avoid the responsibility and throw it on the committee.

Mr. R. then offered a resolution, which he desired to have read for information, and said when it should be in order he would submit it to the House, as follows:

Whereas, it is manifest from the evidence taken by the select committee charged, &c. that the Hon. W. J. GRAVES, the Hon. HENRY A. WISE, the Hon. RICHARD MENEFEE, the Hon. GEORGE W. JONES, the Hon. JESSE A. BYNUM, and the Hon. ALEXANDER DUNCAN, members of this House, were connected by their acts, advice, and conduct, with the duel which terminated in the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, and that they were therein guilty of invading and violating the privileges of this House:

Therefore, resolved, That the journal kept by, and the evidence taken before, said select committee be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report a bill defining the privileges of Congress, and for the punishment of the violations thereof, and also to report a plan for the trial of the above named members, or such of them as in the opinion of said committee are, for their conduct above referred to, liable to punishment by this House.

The CHAIR said this proposition was not in order till the pending motions were disposed of.

Mr. REED was anxious that the subject should be brought to a conclusion, but in the proper way, and for this reason he had submitted his amendment.

Mr. GRANTLAND was indifferent about what instructions were given to the committee, but he insisted that the papers should be printed. It had been alleged that the testimony was not fairly taken; this he pronounced to be false, let it come from whatever quarter it might, and he urged the printing of the whole subject, so that the public might be able to judge. He denied that there was any political feeling in the committee, for their proceedings were conducted with extraordinary unanimity, and he only few differences that existed were mere shades. Mr. G. called upon all who knew him to testify whether he was one likely to be operated upon by such influences as had been stated.

Mr. DAWSON bore testimony to the fact adverted to by his colleague.

Mr. RIVES said he would make a motion which, he hoped, would be acceptable to all parties of the House, and especially so to the gentlemen implicated. He moved to postpone it till the first day of June, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky inquired if this motion required a vote of two-thirds?

The CHAIR replied in the negative; but the motion took precedence of the motion to recommit.

Mr. MENEFEE opposed the motion, because, he said, it was an indirect motion to get rid of it entirely, and against such a disposition he entered his solemn protest. Moreover, to print such a paper, and postpone its consideration, would be a manifest injustice to the parties implicated, who were now ready for trial, and anxiously awaiting it, as it would keep a sentence of condemnation impending over their heads.

Mr. RIVES said he was as anxious as the gentleman for bringing this subject to a correct and speedy conclusion, but the votes of this morning showed they could not do so.

Mr. BYNUM adverted to the announcement made in Mr. RARIDEN'S proposition, as changing his determination to have no participation in this debate; but, since it was announced that he and others not before named were to be tried, he must be allowed to express his opposition to the proposed postponement, while a charge affecting his honor and his character was circulating all over the country. Mr. B. was then proceeding to urge the publication of the testimony, and to give his reasons why it should not be suppressed, in justice to himself, the committee, the House, and the country; but the CHAIR ruled out the discussion, as not in order on a mere motion to postpone to a future day.

Mr. RIVES then interposed, and said that he had made the motion, in the hope that it would meet the general assent of the House, and be taken to-day; finding that not to be the case, and the gentleman from North Carolina expressing a wish to reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. RARIDEN,] he Mr. RIVES, would withdraw his motion. He again repeated the hope that the question would be disposed of to-day.

Mr. R. having withdrawn the motion, the question recurred as first stated above.

Mr. BYNUM stated that he had no particular objection to the resolution pending, nor had he any to that of the gentleman from Indiana, and should most cheerfully vote for it, but he could not help saying that it was altogether a novel proceeding, for he had had no notice given him, no opportunity of furnishing testimony, &c. The gentleman from Massachusetts had asserted that this was a party question, and, so far as one side was concerned, this movement showed that it was so. Mr. B. then defended the course of the committee, and pronounced the allegation that they had made one-sided report to be both a foul and false one.

As to recommitting, he could not see what was to be gained by it; for after the committee brought in their second report, the subject would be in the same situation before the House, that it was at this time. He was willing now to meet any charge, and he wanted all the facts to be known to the House, and to go forth to the country, and let him be judged by his constituents, by those to whom, next to that House, he was responsible. Besides, let the House carry through what they had begun, and not be intimidated or deterred by gasconades and threats, or by the apprehension of any consequences that might grow out of it. As to the objections urged against the proceedings of the committee, on the ground of want of technicality, they were ridiculous, mere spider-web and wire-drawn distinctions about mere obsolete forms, devoid of all substance or meteriality. Then let the House meet the question, without shuddering or seeking to evade the responsibility, or, if they suffered themselves to be alarmed by threats or bullying, let them tell the country so, and let others of more firmness be sent in their places. He hoped, then, that some decision would soon be arrived at, and that if he was to be tried, they would try him speedily.

Mr. THOMPSON adverted to the vast amount of public business pending in the House, and expressed his regret that any charge should be suspended over any members of the House without a hope of correct final action. He thought the House ought to share in the responsibility of the committee; and, though it was known that members were involved, yet it did not appear legally by the record; and he thought it ought not to be taken by implication, as a precedent pregnant with evil. He wished the report might go back to the committee with instructions to report the evidence already taken, and their journal, as soon as may be; and he read a resolution, which he said he should move, when in order, to that effect. Mr. T. made some remarks touching the merits of the case, which the SPEAKER ruled to be out of order. He wished the evidence might go to the world, that a correct judgment might be formed.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. REED to the amendment of Mr. LOOMIS, which, being taken by yeas and nays, was decided in the negative; yeas 79, nays 82.

Mr. DAWSON then moved to lay the whole subject on the table, except the evidence and journal, and that they be printed.

Mr. D. supported his motion by some remarks, tending to show that a recommitment would only produce a great consumption of time, because there were six gentlemen then presented before the House, who would each demand a trial, and those trials would require all the time that would be consumed in the session, to the postponement of the public business, and without ending, as nine-tenths of the House believed, in any definite action, or in any beneficial result.

He urged that nothing more could be effected than by a trial of the members for a violation, directly or indirectly, of the laws of God and man, to produce an impression upon the public mind, and to aid the fanaticism which is now abroad in the country. He thought enough would be done by printing the evidence and journal, and leaving the public to judge. If the majority report was to be printed, the members ought to be allowed to reply to its allegations on that floor. The minority reports he did not think furnished a sufficient answer. The course he proposed, he thought, would enable the public to judge with impartiality and truth, and would take the embarrassing subject out of the House, so that it could proceed with public business. He was willing to have the constituents of the members implicated to read them a moral lesson at the ballot-box.

Mr. BRIGGS called for a division of the question.

The question being put on that part of the motion to lay on the table—

Mr. GRANT demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, were, yeas 56, nays 103.

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Biddle, John Calhoon, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Corwin, Crockett, Dawson, Deberry, DeGraff, Dennis, Dunn, Griffin, Harlan, Hawes, Hoffman, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, W. Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Loomis, Lyon, Martin, May, McKay, Murray, Owens, Palmer, Pennybacker, Pope, Rencher, Rumsey, Sawyer, A. H. Shepherd, C. Shepard, Shields, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Taliaferro, Thompson, Towns, Underwood, A. S. White, J. White, C. H. Williams, and Yell—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Briggs, Bronson, Casey, Childs, Coffin, Connor, Cranston, Curtis, Cushman, Darlington, Davies, Duncan, Edwards, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Goode, W. Graham, Grant, Haley, Hammond, Harper, Hastings, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Holsey, Holt, Hubley, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, J. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kilgore, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Marvin, Samson Mason, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Mercer, Moore, Morgan, Mathias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noble, Ogle, Parker, Parmenter, Patterson, Paynter, Peck, Petrikin, Phelps, Potts, Pratt, Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Rives, Russell, Sheffer, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Spencer, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Webster, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Jared W. Williams—103.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. LOOMIS, to add to the instructions the words, "except as to a breach of privilege," referring to the limitation of the committee's report.

Mr. BRIGGS observed that the committee had been instructed to report upon the breach of privilege, and had done so in full. He thought the committee had fallen into an error, by overlooking the rule, referred to so often, in the Manual, but they had been led into that error by the oversight of the House; and he was in favor of supporting the committee in their action. He referred to the remark, that there was a desire to suppress the evidence; and said he knew of no one who had such a desire. No one, as far as he knew, objected to the publication of the evidence, but to the report which had been made upon it. He would at any moment have voted for the printing of the evidence and journal, but he wished the facts to go forth to the country unconnected with the reports and arguments.

Mr. SIBLEY then moved an amendment to the amendment of Mr. LOOMIS, by adding the words: "and on that subject, that they report the names of every member, who aided, assisted or abetted in the duel, which resulted in the death of Mr. CILLEY, and report as soon as possible."

Mr. BYNUM thanked the gentleman from New York for that proposition to amend. He was ready to meet any investigation, and should not shrink behind any constitutional objections or technicalities. His conduct had been fair and open, and he shrunk from no responsibility. He went on to comment with severity upon the party aspect, and the indirect movements, which had been brought to bear upon the subject from the first, and demanded a full and fair investigation, and that the whole truth might be brought before the world.

Mr. DUNCAN was glad to see the proposition now under consideration, for it was what he anticipated; and he would have been pleased if the gentleman from New York had, instead of an indirect allusion, adverted by name to JESSE A. BYNUM of North Carolina, and ALEXANDER DUNCAN of Ohio. At first they were tied down to rules; but now the whole subject was opened, and he was glad of it, for he was prepared to meet the question; and not only so, but he was willing, in his case, that every technicality, rule of order, constitutional privilege, and every other obstacle, should be disregarded. He entreated the House to go into the investigation, and spread the whole testimony before the world; for he was ready and anxious that the people should pass judgment upon him. He dreaded no such tribunal, but would abide their verdict.

As to the necessity of recommitting the report and testimony, he could not see it. What was to result from it? Was any new evidence sought? No. Was an issue to be made with other parties? If so, those parties (himself and Mr. BYNUM) were prepared to meet it; and he pledged himself to appeal to no obsolete forms, or forgotten rules of technicality. It was absurd to contend that the American Congress was shackled with the old forms of the British parliament; for, in shaking off the trammels of that power, they were surely not imperatively bound by the technical rules under which that power was exercised. But supposing the question of privilege was binding in ordinary cases, did not the resolution of the House, adopted by an overwhelming majority, overrule it? The fact about which the committee were directed to inquire was notorious, and that members of the House were involved in it was equally so; and in the knowledge of that fact the House ordered the investigation, and the committee would have been negligent of their duty if they had not gone on. As to the printing, he urged it in justice to all the parties concerned, and as due to the American people, who, whatever might be said to the contrary, were capable of forming a calm and dispassionate judgment. He had no fears on that subject.

Mr. THOMAS said he would make a motion, the effect of which would be to promote the action of the public business, and he also wanted to get a direct vote on the motion to print. At present they had come to no direct vote. He should submit a motion susceptible of being divided into two distinct propositions; 1st. To lay the whole subject on the table; and 2d. To print the reports of the majority and minority and all the accompanying documents, and he moved accordingly.

Mr. SIBLEY inquired if the motion to print was in order pending his amendment.

The CHAIR stated that it was, because the motion to print was incident to that to lay on the table.

Mr. REED called for a division of the question.

Mr. SIBLEY asked the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw the motion, to afford him an opportunity to reply to the gentlemen from North Carolina and Ohio.

Mr. THOMAS said he would cheerfully comply with the gentleman's request, so far as the gentleman was concerned; but if he did so other gentlemen would also desire to speak, and the object he had in view would be defeated.

Mr. REED asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN moved a call of the House: lost.

Mr. DUNCAN inquired if the motion to lay on the table was in order, it having been once tried to-day.

The CHAIR ruled that it was, as other business had intervened.

Mr. BYNUM inquired whether, if the motion to lay on the table prevailed, the motion to print would not be cut off?

The CHAIR. It will not.

Mr. BYNUM. How then, sir, if decided in the negative?

The CHAIR. Then the original motion having failed, the incidental one will fall with it.

Mr. BYNUM. Then, sir, I understand that a vote in the negative is a vote virtually to suppress the printing.

The CHAIR said that was a question not within his province to give an opinion on.

The question was then taken on the first branch of Mr. THOMAS'S proposition, viz: to lay on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 95.

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Bicknell, Brodhead, Bynum, Cambreleng, Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, DeGraff, Dennis, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Rice Garland, Grantland, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Jabez Jackson, Lewis, Loomis, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, A. McClellan, Miller, Moore, Murray, Noble, Owens, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Prentiss, Randolph, Rencher, Rives, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Snyder, Spencer, Stewart, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Weeks, Albert S. White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yell—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Biddle, Boon, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davee, Davies, Everett, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Filmore, Fry, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Haley, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Holt, Hopkins, Hubley, Wm. H. Hunter, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kennedy, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Marvin, Samson Mason, May, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parker, Parmenter, Patterson, Peck, Pope, Potts, Pratt, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sheffer, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanley, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Vanderveer, Webster, John White, E. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—95.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. SIBLEY then obtained the floor, but several voices calling out "adjourn," adjourn," he gave way to

Mr. FILLMORE, who moved an adjournment.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 56, nays 103.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SIBLEY said that when he offered his amendment, he had not intended to occupy the time of the House. No one was less inclined to obtrude his individual opinions upon the House, nor was any one more inclined to dispose of the unpleasant subject before the House, speedily and quietly. He had not expected that the amendment would have called up the gentlemen from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] and from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN.] It was not intended to apply to them any more than to any others who aided, assisted, or abetted in the unfortunate affair which caused the discussion now occupying the House. But any remarks having a personal character he would not notice upon that floor. He came not as the champion or opponent of any individuals; but in offering the amendment, in calling for the names of all the persons implicated, he was carrying out the wishes of his constituents. The people knew no distinction in the criminality of those concerned; they were educated in the principles of the common law, which knew no accessories in an affair of this kind. He wanted the memorials and petitions to be reported upon; and he thought the fact that the chairman of the committee wished to have the memorials recommitted, proved that he did not think he had reported upon them, and he inferred that there was no intention to report upon them. The memorials prayed for the expulsion of every member engaged in the duel, and he wished a report upon the whole matter.

Mr. TOUCEY explained that he voted for an amendment to the instructions for the purpose of defeating them, and he should finally vote against the recommitment.

Mr. SIBLEY went on to argue in favor of a full report, in conformity to the prayer of the petitions; and repelled the intimation that he had any desire to suppress the evidence in the case, or that any act of his could be construed to imply such a desire; and he condemned the report of the majority as a one-sided argument, contrary to his sense of justice. He condemned it as an argument made by judges, which was brought to bear upon the accused by every distortion of testimony, which would subject any judge of a court of justice to impeachment. He referred to the allusions frequently made to public opinion, and contended that the people would demand a just judgment, according to the forms of the law, which they would not allow to be broken through, that vengeance might reach a victim. He was prepared to march up to the question directly; and he hoped his amendment would prevail, that the whole merits of the subject might come fully before the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor, but, at the suggestion of several members, moved to adjourn.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, when

Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew his motion, and expressed his willingness to proceed in addressing the House; but gave way to another motion to adjourn.

Mr. PETRIKIN again demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered were taken, and resulted—yeas 82, nays 75.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Bell, Borden, Briggs, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Craig, Cranston, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Dunn, Everett, R. NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Williams, and Yell—75.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, May 7, 1838.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated to the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing a condensed statement of the condition of the State banks used as public depositories, according to the latest returns, which was sent in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant: the communication was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the following petitions: From Edward Everett and others, of Boston; from Samuel Fessenden and others, of Portland; from several citizens of the city of New London, Connecticut; from citizens of the county of Oneida, New York; from citizens of Holliston, Massachusetts, and from several other places; all remonstrating against the late alleged treaty with the Cherokees, expressing the opinion that it was not conformable to the wishes of the majority of the tribe, and praying that its execution might not be forced upon them: laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, from George M. Wales, praying a return of duties in certain cases: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, from citizens of New York, asking the establishment of a National Bank: laid on the table.

And from citizens of Wisconsin, praying appropriations for the harbor at Milwaukie, and for a military road from Green Bay to Chicago: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had another petition of a very interesting character, from some officers of the army at present quartered at the South, asking Congress to change the ration of whiskey, and substitute coffee and sugar in its stead. These officers state that the health, cheerfulness, and efficiency of the soldier would be promoted by it, while the quota of whiskey led to insubordination, disease, and crime. The petition was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, presented the petition of certain citizens of Connecticut, stating that the best guns now in use were made of the iron of Connecticut, and praying that the contemplated national armory might be erected on the spot where the ore was procured: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. S. also asked leave to withdraw the papers of Colonel Wisenfelt; which was granted.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of sundry citizens of Wisconsin Territory, asking an appropriation for the survey of a route of a railroad: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, from sundry citizens west of the Mississippi, asking a donation of land for the purpose of erecting a penitentiary: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRUNDY presented a petition of Samuel H. Burton, asking to be released from a certain mail contract, entered into by him with the United States: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from Ebenezer Watson, praying the passage of a law to secure to him the exclusive right to certain inventions to prevent counterfeiting and altering bank notes: referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the letter from the Secretary of War, asking the passage of a general law in relation to a survey of the lands for the Indians into small parcels, made an unfavorable report on the same, which was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision, by law, to prevent the forgery of Treasury notes, and other public securities.

The bill to increase the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired what was the salary of this officer? and was answered by Mr. CLAY of Alabama that it was $3000.

Mr. B. said he should like to know why the salary of this particular officer should be increased. For his part, he was opposed to increasing any salaries in the present condition of the Treasury, unless it could be shown that great injustice was done the officer.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the object of the committee in reporting this bill was to give to the Commissioner a salary commensurate with the amount of labor he has to perform, and the intelligence necessary for the discharge of the duties which devolve on him; and, in doing so, they had reference to the duties devolving on other officers at the seat of Government, heads of Departments, as well as clerks. He thought that if the Senator from Pennsylvania had taken into consideration the duties performed by the other officers of the Government here, together with the degree of intelligence necessary for their performance, and compared them with those of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, he would agree that, so far as labor, talents, and legal skill, were concerned, this officer deserved a better salary than that now given him. In order to qualify themselves for correct action on this subject, the committee had turned their attention to the amount of duties required of the several heads of bureaus at the seat of Government, and the qualifications necessary to fill those offices, and they found that they were comparatively better paid than the officer whose salary they proposed to increase. The First Comptroller and Solicitor of the Treasury received $3500 each, and it could not be said that the value of their services was equal to that of the services of the Commissioner. Their duties were not so arduous, and did not require such talents for their performance. The Comptroller has only the supervision of the accounts, and, with the exception of the laws relating to the revenue, has no legal questions before him; but the Commissioner of the General Land Office must not only be an accountant but a lawyer—in fact, a judge of all the various questions arising out of our land laws that are daily presented before him. His office requires as much legal learning as is requisite in our courts of law. He exercises a supervisory power, not only over the different clerks in his office, but he must also understand the principles of law, in order to prepare the different reports, relating to his department, that are submitted to Congress. He must also decide complicated questions, arising not only under acts of Congress, but involving principles of the laws of the country from which we have derived many of the rules which govern the transfer and titles of real estate. It was under these considerations, and with a full view of the duties of the other officers of the Government, requiring less labor and less talents in their performance, and to put the Commissioner on the same footing with them, that the committee have thought proper to report this bill. They believed that a less amount than the salary provided in the bill would not be adequate to the services performed by this officer; and that the salary ought to be of such amount that, in the event of the death or resignation of the present incumbent, they might command the services of a lawyer of the first eminence. Mr. C. took this opportunity to remark, that it was not at the suggestion of the Commissioner, or of any person for him, or inded with his knowledge, that this bill was reported.

Mr. BUCHANAN had no doubt of the merits and qualifications of the present Commissioner of the General Land Office, and from the little intercourse he had had with him in regard to the duties of his office, he believed he performed them with ability and fidelity. But that was not the question. The question was whether in the present condition of the Treasury, they must borrow a thousand dollars to add to the salary of this officer, and set an example which must be followed in regard to the Auditors of the Treasury, the Second Comptroller, and other officers of the Government. Now the other day in the Senate, they had the greatest difficulty to get the salaries of the Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the Government as high as the Commissioner now receives, though their duties would be more important than his. Besides, there is a Solicitor of the General Land Office to give his advice on all legal questions that are presented in it. Mr. B. said that if he was to give his vote to increase the salaries of any officers of the Government, it would be in favor of the two Assistant Postmasters General, whose salaries were only $2,500 each, and whose duties were exceedingly arduous and important. He would not, in the present state of the Treasury, when the Government would have to borrow money, give his consent to increasing any salaries, unless a case could be shown where great injustice was done to an officer, by the inadequacy of his compensation. Mr. B. would not say any more on this subject, but in order to test the question, he would ask for the yeas and nays on the question of engrossing the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rejoined that the duties of the office required a much higher order of talent than a mere Auditor of Accounts. There were hundreds and thousands of acres of the public domain submitted to the decision of this officer, who he [Mr. C.] had understood, from competent authority, had to devote a portion of the night, as well as the day, to the duties of his office. Mr. C. could not agree that, because there was no money in the Treasury, that a mere act of justice should not be done to a faithful and competent officer. He felt convinced that the contemplated increase was due to the office, to secure competent talent when it might be necessary to fill it hereafter.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he wanted the principle decided now, because if it should be decided to raise any salaries, he would move to increase those of the two Assistant Postmasters General.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, said that, as the Senate was then thin, and he wished a full vote on the question, he would move to lay the bill on the table.

This motion was lost without a division.

The question was then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 6, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Monton, Robinson, Sevier, and Young—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Swift, Trotter, Wall, Webster, White, Williams and Wright—29.

The bill to authorize the erection of a hospital in the City of Washington, was taken up; and,

After an explanation by Mr. ROANE,

Mr. NILES moved to amend the bill so as to confine its benefits to lunatics, seamen, and soldiers; which, after a short discussion, was agreed to—yeas 22, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Trotter, Wall, White and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Southard, Spence, Swift, Webster, Williams and Young—18.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama offered an amendment, which, as modified at the suggestion of Mr. ROANE, limited the appropriation to $30,000, with a proviso that the money shall only be drawn from the Treasury as wanted.

This amendment was agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to authorize the sale of certain bonds belonging to the United States.

Mr. WEBSTER said, if there was that strong necessity which the Senator had represented, he would not oppose, at least would offer no strenuous opposition to the bill. It was not, however, such a measure as he would have recommended. He thought it would have been wiser and better to meet the necessity of the case by a resort to a direct loan, or the issue of Treasury notes. If the Senate could originate no other measure in relation to the Treasury, he submitted whether it was wise to press on this, because no other offered itself.

Mr. W. extended his remarks on the subject to some length, expressing a doubt whether the bonds could be sold at par, and, if sold, what security there was that they would be paid in the constitutional currency of the country. He thought it as well to leave the responsibility where it now exists—in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WRIGHT could not perceive any occasion for taking up the time of the Senate on this bill; it went very far to explain itself, and he would, therefore, merely state the action of his own mind on the subject. From all the information he had received, the credit of this institution was high, not only in the money markets of this country, but in those of Europe; and as the condition of the Treasury required that they should raise money for the service of the Government, which must be done either by the issue of Treasury notes or by a loan, the committee thought that the sale of these bonds would supersede either of these two operations, to the amount that they sold for. Having found that money was cheap in Europe, they supposed that these bonds would furnish desirable investments at their par value. Mr. W. after stating the amount of the interest that had accumulated on these bonds, and the sum expected to be realized by their sale, said that he saw nothing in the objections of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] unless that these bonds might not be payable in a currency equivalent to specie when due. If such was the fact, it must grow out of the subsequent legislation of Congress, for there was nothing at present to warrant the inference. He could not agree to any other disposition of the bill than that the Senate should pass its judgment upon it at this time. If the majority of the body should think that the committee were mistaken in the views which induced them to report it, let them say so. But his opinion was that it would be wise to make the attempt, and if these bonds should fail to bring in the market the sum the bill required for them, the Treasury would be no worse off than it now was. The selling these bonds might save the using the credit of the Government to the amount they may sell for; and if not sold, the Government would lose nothing by making the attempt.

Mr. WEBSTER made a brief reply, to the effect that if there was not at least a reasonable prospect of the measure succeeding, that it would be better not to try it.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that the first objection of the Senator from Massachusetts was one that must exist with, and be disposed of by, the purchaser. If he be not satisfied that he will receive payment in a currency which will make the purchase a good operation, he will not buy. As to the other objection, he supposed Congress would take the necessary measures to provide for the wants of the Government as heretofore. They will either authorize the issuing of a certain amount of Treasury notes, or provide for a loan, and then if the bonds should sell, it would supersede the issue of Treasury notes to that amount. So also if a law passes authorizing a loan, the amount the bonds may sell for will supersede part of the loan.

After some further remarks from Mr. WEBSTER,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

The bill to increase the salaries of certain district judges of the United States was taken up, the question being on the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Indiana to increase the salary of the district judge of Indiana.

Mr. PRENTISS moved to amend the amendment by increasing the salary of the judge for the district of Vermont.

Mr. SEVIER moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed; which motion was agreed to—yeas 26, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Swift, Webster, White, Williams, and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Grundy, King, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Rives, Roane, Wall, and Wright—12.

The bill to revoke the charters of such of the banks of the District of Columbia as shall not resume specie payments within a certain time, was taken up as the order of the day.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to lay the bill on the table, on the ground that the charters of these banks would expire within a very short time.

This motion was agreed to.

The bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia was taken up as the next order; but, without any action being had on it,

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and, after spending a short time therein,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, May 8, 1838.

DEATH OF THE HON. JOAB LAWLER.

Immediately after the reading of the Journal, Mr. LYON of Alabama, rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the melancholy duty to perform of announcing to this House the death of one of its members.

My friend and colleague, the Hon. JOAB LAWLER, expired this morning at his lodgings in this city, after a brief and painful illness, which he bore with unusual fortitude and resignation.

Less than a week ago, and he was present in his place in this hall, in the performance of his part in the laborious duties assigned by the people to their representatives. He was yet in the prime of life, and has been cut off in the midst of his usefulness.

By his death, his immediate constituents and his State have lost an attentive, intelligent, and faithful representative; his family have been deprived of a husband and father; and society has lost a member, whose conduct, in every relation of life, was worthy of all imitation.

The deceased enjoyed the confidence and esteem of those who knew him well, to an extent which nothing but a course of life the most exemplary, and a character the most irreproachable, could have secured.

In his State he had filled several offices of much importance, and under the General Government he held for several years a trust of great responsibility. In all his official conduct in the various public stations held by him, he acquired a high character for integrity and capacity, which no act of his life forfeited or impaired.

His conduct as a member of this House has been in character with his whole life. While he was firm and unwavering in the discharge of what he considered his duty as a Representative, he was mild and unobtrusive in his deportment, and respectful towards his associates. He had lived the life of a Christian, and died without apprehension as to the future.

To testify our regret for his loss, and respect for his memory, I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will attend the funeral of JOAB LAWLER, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Alabama, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of JOAB LAWLER, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of JOAB LAWLER, by wearing crape on their left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That when this House adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify that body of the death of JOAB LAWLER, late a representative from the State of Alabama, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The several resolutions were unanimously agreed to by the House; and then

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, May 8, 1838.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their clerk, announcing the death of the honorable JOAB LAWLER, a member of that House from the State of Alabama, and that his funeral would take place at 12 o'clock to-morrow from their Hall.

Mr. KING then rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Another of the members of this Congress has passed from time to eternity. This unexpected event is well calculated to produce the most serious reflections. "Be ye also ready," should be impressed upon every heart. The Hon. JOAB LAWLER, a Representative from the State of Alabama, breathed his last at his boarding-house in this city, about 9 o'clock this morning. His sickness was of short duration; but a life devoted to piety and virtue enabled him to look with calm and Christian resignation on the dread change that awaited him.

Mr. LAWLER was of humble origin. He was destitute of the advantages of a liberal education; but a vigorous intellect, combined with sterling integrity, early recommended him to the favorable notice of his fellow-citizens, and they placed him in the Legislature of his State. For years he continued to discharge his duties in that situation in a manner so creditable to himself, so satisfactory to those he represented, that they demanded his services in a more exalted station. He yielded to their wishes, and twice has he been chosen to represent their interests in the Congress of the United States. Mr. President, his mortal career has closed. His country has lost the services of one of her most virtuous citizens; his bereaved wife an affectionate husband; and his orphan children the fostering care and protection of an indulgent father. To that desolate, heart-stricken family, I would say, "mourn not as one without hope." The husband—the father—was a Christian. He died, as the Christian dieth, in the full hope of a blessed immortality. Keep, then, before your eyes the purity and holiness of his life: live as he lived, and you may go to him; to you he can never return.

Mr. K. then submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the honorable JOAB LAWLER, deceased, which will take place from the Hall of the House of Representatives; and, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of that body will go into the usual mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

On motion of Mr. KING,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
THURSDAY, May 10, 1838.

On motion of Mr. LYON, the Speaker was directed to notify the Governor of Alabama that a vacancy had occured in the representation of that State, by the death of the honorable JOAB LAWLER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Executive communications, viz:

1. From the Secretary of State, communicating the names, grades, removals, dates of appointment, &c. of all ministers and other diplomatic agents of the United States to foreign countries.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid on the table.

2. From the acting Secretary of War, a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in reference to the payment of the annuity due to the Seneca Indians for the year 1837.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, laid on the table.

On leave, petitions were presented by Mr. HOFFMAN, of New York, and Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia.

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked a similar leave, but it was objected to; and his motion to suspend the rules for the purpose was rejected without a division.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the CHAIR was directed to appoint a member on the Committee on Private Land Claims, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the decease of Mr. LAWLER.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

The following message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, Abraham Van Buren, esq.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit to the consideration of Congress a statement prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, by which it appears that the United States, with over twenty-eight millions in deposite with the States, and over fifteen millions due from individuals and banks, are, from the situation in which these funds are placed, in immediate danger of being rendered unable to discharge, with good faith and promptitude, the various pecuniary obligations of the Government.

The occurrence of this result has for some time been apprehended, and efforts made to avert it. As the principal difficulty arises from a prohibition in the present law to reissue such Treasury notes as might be paid in before they fall due, and may be effectually obviated by giving the Treasury during the whole year the benefit of the full amount originally authorized; the remedy would seem to be obvious and easy.

The serious embarrassments likely to arise from a longer continuance of the present state of things, induces me respectfully to invite the earliest action of Congress to the subject which may be consistent to a due regard for other public interests.

M. VAN BUREN.

MAY 10, 1838.

[The statement referred to in the above message will be found in the Senate proceedings.]

The Message and accompanying document of the Secretary of the Treasury having been read,

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose and remarked that, two or three days ago, he made a motion on the subject referred to in these documents, but which failed from its requiring a majority of two thirds. He should not, at this moment, renew the motion, but he gave notice that he should do so in the course of the day, unless the privileged question (the duelling report) was sooner disposed of.

Mr. C. then moved to refer the foregoing papers to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD reminded the gentleman from New York that he [Mr. U.] was entitled to the floor on the subject referred to, but he was perfectly willing to forego it, in view of the necessity and urgency of proceeding with the despatch of public business. If it was the pleasure of the House to postpone the subject indefinitely, he would make that motion as soon as the above papers were of disposed, but if that motion should not prevail, he should go on with his remarks.

Mr. SERGEANT presumed the papers could be printed by to-morrow morning, and as there had been but an imperfect opportunity of knowing their contents from the reading at the Clerk's desk, he would suggest whether the gentleman from New York had not better postpone his motion to go on with the public business till to-morrow, and devote this day to the disposal of the other matter.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that they could not proceed to the public business one moment too soon; and as it would be debated, the sooner the debate was commenced the better, for there was little probability, though he wished it were otherwise, that the subject would be disposed of in a single day. With reference to the motion adverted to by the gentleman from Kentucky, perhaps the gentleman was not aware, that on a motion to postpone indefinitely, the whole merits were open for discussion, and therefore it would not bring the House to a vote sooner than the others.

Mr. C's motion to refer and print the above papers was then agreed to.

DUELLING REPORT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he was fully aware of the nature of a motion to postpone indefinitely, but his object was to get clear of the whole subject during the present session; and unless it could be done, he saw no reason why the debate should not go on.

As the gentleman from New York, however, wished to test the sense of the House by renewing his motion, Mr. U. would give way for that purpose.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of considering and continuing the consideration of bills referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRAVES expressed a wish to make a few remarks in opposition to the motion, but it was not under the rule; and Mr. G. then moved a call of the House, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and being yeas 102, nays 75, the House determined that there should be a call.

After proceeding for some time, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the call was dispensed with, and Mr. C. withdrew his proposition.

The question on the duelling report was then announced by the CHAIR.

It was, on the motion of Mr. TOUCEY, under the direction of the committee, to print the report and testimony, with the substitute of Mr. ADAMS, to recommit with certain instructions, to report the facts, "without comments or arguments;" to which Mr. LOOMIS moved the following amendment: "except as to the question of a breach of privilege."

The pending question was on the amendment of Mr. SIBLEY to Mr. LOOMIS'S, as follows:

"And on that subject, that they report the names of every member, who aided, assisted, or abetted in the duel, which resulted in the death of Mr. CILLEY, and report as soon as possible."

Mr. UNDERWOOD was proceeding in his remarks, when he was arrested by the CHAIR for going into a wide scope of discussion. Mr. U. took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, and argued it for some time, on the ground that the amendment of Mr. SIBLEY did open the whole subject, and asked for the yeas and nays on the appeal, which were ordered.

The point was discussed by Messrs. MERCER, and READ, when, after some conversation between the CHAIR and Mr. U. the subject was dropped.

Mr. U. then proceeded to argue against the power of the House to punish for sending a challenge to a member to fight a duel, or to punish a member for fighting a duel, since it did not violate the privileges of the members, as given them by the Constitution, and that, as against Mr. SIBLEY'S amendment, if the House could not punish the principals, it could not punish the aiders and abettors. Hence he contended that the best disposition which could be made of this subject was to postpone it indefinitely. If, however, the House was determined to punish the one, it should go on to punish the others; for the man who loaded the gun was as guilty as he who fired it, the aiders and abetters as the principals and seconds, though Mr. U. was opposed to the whole proceeding.

Mr. THOMAS, after some explanatory remarks, stating the object of the motion to be to postpone it for future action, as it could be called up by a bare majority, moved to lay the report and accompanying documents on the table, and print them. Mr. T. asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. JENIFER called for a division of the question on laying on the table and printing.

Mr. GRANT moved a call of the House: lost.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Aycrigg, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Daberry, DeGraff, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Halsted, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Prentiss, Rhett, Rives, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Turney, Underwood, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, Beatty, Bell, Biddle, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dennis, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Herod, Hopkins, Hubley, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Wm. Cost Johnson, Keim, Kennedy, Lincoln, Logan, Marvin, Samson Mason, McKennan, Mercfee, Mercer, Millican, Calvary Morris, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Peck, Pope, Potts, Potter, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robertson, Ramsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sheffer, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Sanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Vanderve r, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yorke—76.

So the whole subject was laid on the table; and the question recurring on the motion to print,

Mr. PETRIKIN then rose and said that, in order to put an end to this interminable debate on mere incidental questions, and to progress with the business of the country, which had been, in consequence, so much retarded, he was induced to demand the previous question.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana asked the gentleman to withdraw the motion, to enable him to move to print the evidence and journal of the committee.

Mr. PETRIKIN declined.

Mr. GARLAND then moved to reconsider the vote by which the subject was laid on the table.

The CHAIR ruled that the incidental motion to print must be first decided, as it was only a branch of the general motion.

Mr. GARLAND took an appeal from this decision, but subsequently withdrew it, and also the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ADAMS renewed the motion to reconsider, but Mr. A. having voted in the minority, could not move it.

Mr. GARLAND then moved a call of the House, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 64, nays 123.

So the call was refused.

The previous question on the motion to print was then seconded 97 to 84, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. BRIGGS called for a division of the question on printiug the reports and documents.

Mr. SLADE called for a division on the several arguments in the report.

The CHAIR could not entertain a motion to divide the same paper.

The question was then taken on printing the reports of the majority and minority, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 74, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, John W. Mr. EVERETT, on leave, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a supplementary bill to provide for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs, approved June, 1834.

Mr. EVERETT also reported Senate bill for the relief of the legal representatives of George Du Val, with a proposition to strike out the enacting clause: committed.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to refund certain duties on railroad iron, imported by the New York and Harlem railroad company.

Mr. BOON said he was about to make a motion. During the progress of this discussion, said he, frequent appeals have been made in behalf of the "dear people," and he would now make a motion to test the sincerity of gentlemen. He would move that 20,000 extra copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the select committee, together with the evidence, on the duelling investigation, be printed for the use of the "dear people" of this country.

The CHAIR remarked that the motion required the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. BOON would ask it, and expressed a hope that no gentleman would object.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana objected, and Mr. REED interposing a motion to adjourn, which prevailed,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, May 10, 1838.

CONDITION OF THE TREASURY.

The following message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, Esq.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit to the consideration of Congress a statement prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, by which it appears that the United States, with over twenty-eight millions in deposite with the States, and over fifteen millions due from individuals and banks, are, from the situation in which these funds are placed, in immediate danger of being rendered unable to discharge, with good faith and promptitude, the various pecuniary obligations of the Government.

The occurrence of this result has for some time been apprehended, and efforts made to avert it. As the principal difficulty arises from a prohibition in the present law to reissue such Treasury notes as might be paid in before they fall due, and may be effectually obviated by giving the Treasury, during the whole year, the benefit of the full amount originally authorized, the remedy would seem to be obvious and easy.

The serious embarrassments likely to arise from a longer continuance of the present state of things, induces me respectfully to invite the earliest action of Congress to the subject which may be consistent to a due regard for other public interests.

M. VAN BUREN.

MAY 10, 1838.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May, 10, 1838.

The undersigned would respectfully submit to the President the following statement concerning some fiscal embarrassments which are likely soon to happen, unless averted by early legislation.

It has been usual for the Secretary of the Treasury, except in the annual report on the finances, and in replies to special calls or directions by either House of Congress, to give information respecting all matters which appertain to his office, through letters addressed to the appropriate committees. For some months past, and on several occasions, that mode has been pursued in respect to these threatened embarrassments, by giving to the Committee of Ways and Means such information concerning them as the public exigencies and a seasonable foresight seemed to require. Some suggestions and facts connected with them have likewise been introduced into reports made to Congress. But the relief desired having not yet been granted, and a longer omission to provide for the emergency having a tendency to impair public credit, to the great prejudice of contractors and workmen, as well as of pensioners, the army, navy, and many other classes, the undersigned deems it his duty to apprize the Executive also of the impending difficulties, in order that he may take such further steps as appear proper to promote a faithful discharge of the pecuniary obligations of the Government.

The peculiarity in the present condition of the finances can be very briefly explained. It has arisen, not from any actual deficiency which has yet occurred in the amount of receipts anticipated for the year; not from any excess of appropriations which has yet been made for either ordinary or extraordinary objects; but from a prohibition to use, for the payment of the public dues, which is required by law to be received for them.

In the act of October last, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, they were made receivable at any time for those dues, but were expressly forbidden, after such receipt, from being reissued in discharge of claims on the Treasury. From this circumstance, coupled with the protracted failure of most of the banks to resume specie payments, little has of late been received for revenue except Treasury notes. Over five and a half millions of them have already been paid in, though none fall due till about the 1st of November next. As these cannot be paid out again, or others in their place, till the restriction before mentioned is modified, it has followed that a great portion of the receipts of the year have thus far been entirely useless for aiding to defray the large expenditures charged upon it, and resort has of necessity been had to the emission of more Treasury notes under the original act, until the whole amount authorized, except $216,802, has been exhausted.

The only other means available to meet the public engagements, with the exceptions as to trusts and the Mint, detailed in a special report on the condition of the Treasury to the House of Representatives the 26th of March last, are reduced to about $347,432.

These constitute an aggregate of five hundred and sixty-four thousand two hundred and thirty-four dollars thus available, instead of a balance of from two to six millions, which it has generally been considered wise to retain on hand, in order, with the aid of the current revenue, to insure punctuality, and guard against the embarrassments incident to fluctuations and other contingencies. During the present year the revenue has been paid in Treasury notes to such an extent that only about one fourth of a million, monthly, has been received from it in money, so as to assist in discharging the current expenditures. These last, on an average, have been over two millions monthly, and in April nearly three millions.

As more than four millions of the Treasury notes are still outstanding, and the banks generally have not yet resumed specie payments, it is probable that a great part of the revenue will, for some time to come, be paid in a similar manner. Under such circumstances, and when it is considered that large sums due from the postponed custom-house bonds, the banks, and the States, are not yet payable, and that no power now exists, except in Congress, to recall the deposites from the latter; that there is no reserved fund to resort to, or any other authorized means by which the wants of the Treasury can be supplied, it is manifest that the Department is exposed weekly and almost daily to be deprived of the whole of its available means, and the credit of the Government to be injuriously affected, both at home and abroad.

Congress could readily avert these results, if approving the course suggested in the last annual report on the finances. It could remove the prohibition to reissue the notes which may be, or have been, prematurely paid in and redeemed, and, where they have been cancelled, permit others to be issued in their stead; or it could effect the same object by allowing other notes to be emitted, instead of such as have been and shall hereafter be paid in, before the year for their redemption expires. By the seasonable adoption of either of these measures, all anticipated embarrassments during 1838, can probably be obviated. For, in that event, no provision of additional means to meet the expenditures of the year will be necessary hereafter, unless before the close of the session it shall appear that new appropriations have been made, or are likely to be made, exceeding the estimates submitted by the Department in December last, by several millions, or that the revenues received will be materially less.

On the contrary, if neither of the measures above proposed should meet the approbation of Congress, it is obvious that among the various substitutes which may be thought of, or which this Department has taken occasion to suggest in communications to the Committee of Ways and Means, some one must be selected, that can be made efficient in its operation, at a very early day, or it will be impracticable to preserve the national faith unbroken, and to avert the injuries with which the public service is threatened.

With great respect,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the War Department, made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 13th March last, requiring various kinds of information in reference to the money belonging to the Indian tribes.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, on the subject of the northeastern boundary; which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Messrs. WEBSTER, SMITH of Connecticut, MORRIS, and RUGGLES, severally presented petitions, remonstrating against the late Cherokee treaty; which were laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania, asking Congress to grant a portion of the public domain to that institution, and to others of a similar character, for the purpose of promoting the cause of education. This memorial [said Mr. B.] states, and with perfect truth, "that while our country abounds in collegiate institutions, few, if any, possess those appendages which have rendered so illustrious and so perfect the institutions of older countries. Appropriate libraries, complete museums of natural science, extensive philosophical apparatus, in short, collections illustrative of the progress and attainments of science abroad, and furnishing the most perfect means of instruction at home, are yet wanting, and are not likely to be secured with the present defective means of our colleges."

The memorial was well calculated to attract public attention to this important subject. He therefore moved that it should be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was ordered accordingly.

Mr. YOUNG presented the remonstrance of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, against legalizing floats on certain tracts of land: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report on the subject of light houses; which was, without reading, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RIVES gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to reorganize the marine corps.

Mr. WILLIAMS gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to provide for the survey of the North Eastern Boundary.

The bill for the erection of a hospital in the District of Columbia, came up on its third reading.

Mr. MORRIS opposed the bill chiefly on constitutional grounds. In the course of his remarks, he took occasion to say that retrocession was what the people of this District ought above all to advocate. He was aware of the position in which legislators stood here. If they opposed any measures of this kind, they are supposed to feel unfriendly to the interests of the District. He disavowed all such feeling, but said he should feel himself compelled to vote against any appropriation for local purposes, or those not immediately connected with Congress.

Mr. ROANE advocated the measure with much zeal and ability as having a tendency to aid the cause of humanity. He replied to the constitutional objections of Mr. MORRIS, and asked if Congress had not the same right to tax the people to establish a hospital in the District of Columbia, that it had to establish a United States arsenal at Old Point Comfort.

Mr. BUCHANAN felt as kindly feeling for the people of this district as any man, and expressed a willingness to serve them on all proper occasions. This, however, was not a proper time for appropriations for such purposes: he had just been told that the Treasury was nearly run aground; and were they, in the face of that fact, to borrow money for the purpose of building a hospital? Mr. B. did not know but he would be in favor of the bill were it not for that fact. It was from the same feeling that he was induced to vote against the appropriation for Michigan, and he was willing to place the District of Columbia on the some footing with Michigan.

Mr. B. said, in order to test the sense of the Senate in relation to the matter, he would move to postpone the bill until the first Monday in December next, and on that question he should demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORVELL said he did not rise to reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, or to any thing connected with the bill; but he really could not resist the desire to thank him for the comparison he had so kindly instituted between the District of Columbia and the State of Michigan.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he hoped the honorable Senator was not offended with the remark; that Senator would be the last man, and Michigan was the last State, of which he would utter any thing disrespectful.

Nr. NORVELL, (laughingly,) as the gentleman has made the amende honorable, in the latter part of his remark, I must be satisfied.

Mr. CALHOUN avowed himself a silent listener to all the arguments offered on this occasion, and was constained to say that, in no view that he could take of it, could he permit himself to vote in favor of the measure. He thought it both wrong and inexpedient. He agreed fully with the views taken by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] as to its being contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, and besides he put no faith in the estimate of 30,000 dollars. We all knew when a public building was once commenced that it was never finished under five times the original estimate. Mr. C. concluded by wishing that the matter might be postponed, and, if brought up, that it would be ultimately rejected.

The question was then taken on Mr. BUCHANAN'S motion, and it was carried—yeas 23, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Wall, White, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Trotter, Webster, Williams, and Young—20.

The bill to authorize the sale of certain bonds belonging to the United States was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to prevent the forgery of Treasury Notes, and other securities of the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill regulating writs of error in the courts of the United States.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, who voted with the majority, the vote on indefinitely postponing the bill to increase the salaries of the district judges of the United States, was ordered to be reconsidered.

The bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia was then taken up.

Mr. BENTON avowed himself opposed to the extension of the charter of these banks for twenty years. He admitted something was due to these institutions, and he had drawn up a proposition extending to them time on certain conditions, which, when they should have been complied with, would enable them to present themselves with a better grace for an extension of their charters. They were to quit at once the shin-plaster work; to redeem their five dollar notes after the 4th of July; and, after a given time, resume in full, and cease to pay out the notes of non-specie-paying banks. In the proposition the Clerk had now read, he should move to strike out the enacting clause, and insert as follows:

That the charters of the Union Bank, and of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and the Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the fourth day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-nine: Provided, The said banks, each for itself, shall conform to the following conditions:

First. To cease receiving or paying out all paper currency of less denomination than five dollars, on or before the day of the promulgation of this act.

Second. To cease paying out the notes of non-specie paying banks, bankers, or corporations, on or before the fourth day of July, in the present year.

Third. To redeem all their notes of the denomination of five dollars in gold or silver, from and after the fourth day of July, in the present year.

Fourth. To resume specie payments in full, on or before the first Monday in December, of the present year.

Mr. ROANE spoke at some length against the amendment, and in favor of the bill as originally drafted, and which he was afraid at the time would have been considered too rigid.

Mr. HUBBARD thought it would be as well to repeal the charters at once as to pass that proviso. He did not think that any considerable portion of the Senate would be found to advocate such a measure. Mr. H. thought it would be as well to extend the charters of these banks during the pleasure of Congress. If then they did not do their duty to the community, their conduct would rise in judgment against them, and their charters could be at once repealed.

Mr. H. submitted the following, which he proposed to offer when in order:

That the existing charters of the Bank of Washington, Bank of the Metropolis, the Patriotic Bank of Washington, all in the city of Washington, and that the charter of the stockholders of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, in the city of Georgetown, and that the charters of the stockholders of the Bank of Potomac, and of the stockholders of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, both in the city of Alexandria, shall be continued in full force and effect, after the fourth day of July next, during the pleasure of Congress, subject to any modification which may at any time hereafter be adopted, or subject to be at any time hereafter repealed by the legislation of Congress: Provided, That this act shall be of no effect, unless the corporations therein named shall resume specie payments for their circulation and other liabilities, on or before the first day of January next, or simultaneously with the banks of the cities of Baltimore and Richmond, should those banks resume at an earlier day.

Mr. GRUNDY was in favor of the principles in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, though he thought it ought to be somewhat modified, being too rigid in the conditions imposed on the banks. These banks, he said, had all violated their charters, and he thought it a bad time to renew them while they were in open violation of law. But whenever they should resume payment, and act in accordance with the provisions of their charters, he would be for granting them new ones, with such conditions and restrictions as the wisdom of Congress might devise for the protection of the community. He could not now tell whether these banks would eventually turn out to be sound and solvent, and he would therefore wait awhile, until they had an opportunity of giving some evidence of it. He believed the terms of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Missouri were too rigid. He did not know how far the banks could stand the payment of their five dollar notes, and to require them not to trade in the notes of the banks that did not pay specie, would be a hard provision, and perhaps destroy their business altogether. Under these circumstances, he would move that the whole subject be postponed for the purpose of giving it a sufficient examination, and in the mean time he wished the amendments of the Senators from Missouri and New Hampshire [Messrs. BENTON and HUBBARD] to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD believed that the Bank of Washington was paying specie on all its notes. He was prepared to act on the bill now, but if it was the general sense of the Senate not to act on it at this time, he was willing to lay it on the table, or, by passing his substitute, leave the banks in their present situation until Congress thought proper to act definitively with regard to them. He would observe, however, that it was not his intention to press his substitute without the approbation of the committee who reported the bill.

Mr. TIPTON was opposed to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone the bill. The bill was a very important one in regard to the business of the District of Columbia—it had been prepared with great care by the committee, and was supposed, by its friends, to be as liberal a proposition as the Senate would be willing to pass. The Senator from New Hampshire, supposing that the Senate would not be willing to come up to this measure, proposed to charter these banks during the pleasure of Congress; and they had been told that too much of the session had gone by to act on the subject. This he could not agree to, for repeated examinations had been made of the affairs of these banks, and their condition was sufficiently understood to act with regard to them at once. If they postponed the subject further, what would the people of this District have to hope for? Their situation was bad enough now, and further suspense would make it worse. Every one acquainted with the business of banking knew that, for the last twenty years, the conduct of many of them had been bad enough, yet it was not just, because some of them had done wrong, to denounce the whole of them—the good as well as the bad. One of the banks of this District (the Bank of Washington) was, as the Senator from New Hampshire informed them, already paying specie, and, therefore, there ought to be no difficulty with regard to that institution. If there was a bank that had conducted itself improperly, he was for investigating its conduct, and for treating it accordingly; but the banks whose conduct was good, certainly deserved some credit. He hoped the round and sweeping denunciations of gentlemen against all the banks would not have any weight on the Senator. He was against all postponement, and he wished to hear all that could be said on both sides of the question, and particularly he wished to hear the views of those gentlemen who were opposed to the banks.

Mr. BENTON repudiated the idea that the Bank of Washington could be denominated a specie paying bank. It was better to let them know at once that Senators in their characters of legislators were not to be bamboozled by such representations. He had been in this city for five or six months, and had never seen a note of that bank in circulation, nor did he know any of his friends that had. What he understood by specie paying banks, were those institutions that had circulation, and redeemed that circulation when called on: was it the case in the instance alluded to? He thought that bank more culpable than any of the others, because it acted as a kind of conductor through which the trash in the shape of money from abroad was foisted upon the people, while that bank was called a specie paying bank. Mr. B. expressed his readiness to meet this question at any time, and said he was prepared to show that the banking business of this country as it was transacted, was fraught with danger to the community. That all the sympathies of Congress seemed in favor of banks, while the community were never thought of in the matter. His [Mr. B's] sympathies were for the community, and he would endeavor to defend that interest from the machinations of all banks that did not redeem their notes at the will of the holder.

Mr. TIPTON observed that the Senator from Missouri and himself differed very widely in their opinions on the subjects of banks and banking. The Bank of Washington, which redeemed its notes in specie, the Senator looked upon as the very worst of all banks, and at the same time was very strong in his denunciations of the banks that did not pay. Now he [Mr. T.] did not understand this. He looked with as much abhorrence on the excessive issues of banks, and an irredeemable currency, as the Senator from Missouri did; but it did not seem to him that the banks of this District were liable to censure on this score. He did not, however, justify the banks for the violation of their charters, but thought that their conduct was bad enough. He was for continuing the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, and of all other banks that resume specie payments and continue payment in good faith; and if these banks should resume simultaneously with the banks of Philadelphia and Baltimore, he would be satisfied. This was all he contended for, and he hoped the Senate would not give the question the go-by.

After some remarks from Messrs. GRUNDY, HUBBARD, NILES, and ROANE,

Mr. DAVIS was opposed to the postponement for very obvious reasons. Congress had caused investigation after investigation into the affairs of these banks, and therefore they could not obtain additional information by any further delay. All these investigations had resulted much to the credit of the District banks. It was now said that they were not prepared to act, and a sort of rod in pickle was kept in store for these banks, which, in his judgment operated injuriously on them, and consequently, on the community. At the extra session, a bill was brought in to repeal their charters, provided they did not resume payment in sixty days, the effect of which was to stop their discounts, and injure materially the business of the District. And just so long as this subject was kept in agitation, and the charters of these banks in a state of suspense, this state of things must necessarily exist, to the great injury of the people of this District. The Senator from Missouri condemned strongly the conduct of the specie-paying banks, as well as the conduct of those that did not pay, and therefore it would be perfectly vain for them to hope to gain the approbation of gentlemen who used such arguments. Again: it was urged that there was no time specified in the bill by which it was made imperative on these banks to resume. Now he apprehended such was not the fact, for the bill provided that when the banks of Richmond and Baltimore resumed, these banks should also resume, or forfeit their charters. If they compelled the District bands to resume before the above named banks did, they must necessarily cease to transact business, or transact it at a loss.

Mr. BENTON apprehended that the Senrtor from Massachusetts did not hear his remarks, otherwise he would not have represented him as opposed to a bank paying specie. The bank of which he [Mr. B.] spoke purported to pay specie for its notes, while it had not a dollar in circulation. This was an assumption which had no foundation.

Mr. DAVIS said the gentleman from Missouri was correct in the explanation of the purport of his remarks, and he so understood him at the time. He agreed, too, with the Senator, that a bank which purported to pay specie on demand while it had no circulation, was a sort of a humbug.

Mr. BENTON. Yes, sir, a perfect humbug.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought himself that this was an appropriate time to act on the subject one way or the other; but as it was after four o'clock, and as he should like to examine into the principles not only of the bill, but of the two substitutes proposed by the Senators from Missouri and New Hampshire, he thought it better to lay the subject over informally until to-morrow, and proceed then to the consideration of Executive business, of which there was some on the table that ought to be attended to speedily.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, May 11, 1838.

Mr. BOULDIN called the attention of the House to an error in the list of votes in the morning papers, and in the vote book of the House, which he was well assured, was accidental. He was represented to have voted on the duelling propositions yesterday, whereas he was temporarily out out of his seat when those votes were taken. He took that opportunity to say, that had he been present, should have voted against laying the subject on the table, and in favor of the printing.

The error was ordered to be corrected by the Clerk.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked leave to offer the following resolutions, which were received:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished for the information of this House, the names of Topographical and Assistant Topographical Engineers who, during any time in 1837, have been employed on civil works of internal improvement; distinguishing first such works as may be required to be executed by the General Government pursuant to acts of Congress; second, such civil works as may be prosecuted by the State Governments, or under the authority of incorporated companies, specifying under each class the description and location of each particular work.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished for the information of this House, a statement in such form as will exhibit at one view the sums expended in 1837 on the several objects of internal improvement, specifying the description, use, and location of each work; in what State or Territory situated; the amount expended on each object; the name of the officer, superintendent, or agent employed; the amount of compensation of every description allowed him; whether an officer of any corps of the army, or a civilian; if the latter, specify his profession and avocation, and when employed by the Government.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished, for the information of this House, the names of the Topographical Engineers who have been serving with the army in Florida during the recent campaign. Also, the names of such officers of that corps as may have been employed, or are intended to be employed, the ensuing season, on any civil works of internal improvement, specifying the description and location of each work; distinguishing, also, such as may be under the direction of the General Government from those prosecuted by the States or by incorporated companies.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished, for the information of this House, the names of all Civil Engineers and superintendents or agents now employed, or intended to be employed in 1838, on civil works of internal improvement of any kind whatever, specifying the description and location of each work, and in what State or Territory situated; the amount contemplated to be expended on each object; the amount or rate of compensation allowed, or to be allowed, to each civil engineer, superintendent, or agent; and if compensation be allowed at this time, state when the pay commenced, the funds from which drawn, and whether the rates be a per diem or a per annum.

The resolutions, under the rule, lie over one day for consideration.

Mr. GRAVES moved to print 20,000 extra copies of the testimony and journal of the Select Committee of Investigation on the late duel; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAIG asked leave to present a petition or resolution for a post route; but it was objected to.

INDIAN ANNUITIES.

Mr. PENNYBACKER asked leave to offer the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House if the annuities engaged to be paid by the United States (in specie) to the Ottoway and Chippewa nation of Indians by the 4th section of the treaty concluded between the said United States and the said nation of Indians, on the 28th day of March, 1836, have been paid; and if paid, whether they were paid in specie or not; and if not paid, the reasons why; and that he be furthermore directed to communicate to the House any information that he may possess in regard to the purchase by the agent of the Government, for the use of the Indians, large quantities of goods from Suydham, Jackson and Co. of the city of New York; the qualities and prices of the goods so purchased; whether good, and at reasonable prices; and the kind of money, and the manner in which they were paid for by the Government; and whether any of the said goods are on the hands of the Government, and where.

Mr. FAIRFIELD asked leave to submit a motion to print 20,000 extra copies of the reports of the majority and minority on the subject of the late duel.

Objection being made—

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRAVES explained that he had intended to embrace the reports in his motion.

The CHAIR said he would so consider it, unless it was objected to.

Objection was made; whereupon,

Mr. BOON and Mr. FAIRFIELD simultaneously moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the other motion prevailed; which was agreed to.

Mr. GRAVES then submitted a motion to print 20,000 copies of the journal and evidence alone.

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved an amendment, to add an equal number of the reports.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, objected to the latter on the ground that it would be unjust to the parties implicated, though, if the gentleman from Kentucky choose to waive it, he would not object.

Mr. PARKER, of New York, was in favor of the amendment, and he could not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CAMPBELL] that there was to be no trial of those implicated. A majority could take up the subject at any time, and he should insist on proceeding with it as soon as one or two of the most urgent public bills were disposed of. As to the charge that the report of the majority was an argument against the members implicated, we should not forget that it would be accompanied by the minority report, which might, with equal propriety, be considered an argument in their defence.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio said, that as he had never voted to print a larger number of any document than ten thousand copies, he moved to reduce the number to that now.

Mr. HARLAN inquired of the gentleman from Maine whether he had any knowledge of a large edition of the report of the majority having been already published?

Mr. FAIRFIELD did not recognise the gentleman's right to propound such a question to him, but still he would respond to it. He did understand that an edition had been published, and he himself had subscribed for several hundred copies, to send home to his constituents, and if it had been in his power, should have subscribed for as many thousands.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BOON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 57, nays 119.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table, and the question recurring upon Mr. WHITTLESEY's amendment to substitute "ten" for "twenty" thousand copies, with the amendment of Mr. FAIRFIELD to print the reports—

Mr. MASON of Ohio, objected to the publication of the report of the majority, because it was partial, presented a one-sided view of the subject, and, instead of summing up the evidence, in a fair and impartial manner, between the parties, had aggravated the guilt of one side and mitigated that of the other. Mr. M. was proceeding to discuss the merits of the report, when he was arrested by the CHAIR as not being in order.

Mr. M. remarked that, as the "Globe" of this morning stated they had been twenty days discussing a subject without going into its merits, he hoped he might have been permitted now to touch upon the merits a little. He did not desire to travel out of the report itself, but upon the face of that document to show that it did manifest injustice to some of the parties. Mr. M. cited that part of it setting forth that the proposition to shorten the distance was an aggravation, whereas the parties were fighting at a distance of twelve yards farther than was originally agreed upon by Mr. CILLEY himself, and there was no evidence to show that the distance was proposed to be shortened less than the original eighty yards. Moreover, in speaking of Mr. CILLEY, the report dealt throughout in superlatives, by speaking of his high character, noble bearing, and fine feeling, whereas nothing of that kind was said of the others.

He also objected to the printing, in the conviction that it would produce no good, produce no moral result, and in no way be calculated to effect that end which should have been the sole object of the committee. It was more like an electioneering document than any thing else, endeavoring to prove one party flagrantly guilty, and the other purely innocent. Upon a further ground he also objected to the printing: that a large edition had already been privately printed and circulated from one end of the country to the other; and there was thence the less necessity for printing another large edition of the same document.

At this stage, the hour for morning business having expired—

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the orders of the day.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, suggested to the gentleman to waive the motion for a time to give the committees an opportunity of reporting.

Mr. CAMBRELENG assented, with the understanding that, as soon as this business was gone through, his motion would be agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved that the House go into committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to, and the House accordingly went into committee, Mr. INGHAM in the chair.

TREASURY NOTES.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee took up the following bill.

A BILL to carry into effect an act approved the twelfth day of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, "to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be, issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the Treasury and cancelled.

Mr. CAMBRELENG congratulated the committee on the resumption of its labors after so long an interval. The delay was unfortunate. It had been not only embarrassing to the Treasury, but highly injurious to the public creditors, and to all in any manner connected with the public service. It is an extraordinary occurrence, that a Government, whose actual resources, in proportion to its annual receipts and expenditures, were more ample than those of any other Government, should, by mere delay in legislation, be unable to discharge its obligations for current expenditures.

All that the Treasury requires is the full benefit of the act of the 12th October, as is proposed by the bill under consideration. That act authorized an issue of ten millions of Treasury notes, redeemable in twelve months from the date when issued, for the purpose of enabling the Government to collect, in the mean time, an equal amount which was receivable in 1838 from our banks and merchants. Had these Treasury notes been redeemed after the expiration of the twelve months, that is, between October, 1838 and June, 1839, the Treasury would have been able to meet all its engagements without any other financial measure. They were, however, made receivable for customs and lands, and about five millions and a half had been already paid into the Treasury and cancelled. It becomes necessary, therefore, in order to secure to the Treasury the benefit of the October act, to authorize an issue of Treasury notes equal to the amount paid into the Treasury and cancelled prior to the period fixed for their redemption. This was the extent of the aid the committee proposed, notwithstanding the impression here and the misrepresentations abroad, that twenty millions would be required.

We have heard much sir here and elsewhere about a bankrupt Treasury, loans and a public debt. Such statements and anticipations are without foundation. Were it otherwise, I trust the bankruptcy of our Treasury, and the prospect of a public debt, would not be subjects of rejoicing to any gentleman. What, sir, was the origin of these Treasury notes, about which so much has been said? The country was in the midst of a commercial revulsion, and Congress assembled for the purpose of exercising all its constitutional powers, through its financial measures, to relieve trade as far as it was practicable. There was no bankruptcy of the Treasury. The resources of the Government were ample, but the public creditors were unable to meet their engagements. We had extended the credit to the Bank of the United States to one, two, and three years, and were about to postpone the payment of our custom-house bonds to twelve and fifteen months, and the debt of the deposite banks still longer. Thus twenty millions of dollars of the revenue of 1837, and previous years, were postponed to 1838, '39, and '40. To grant this indulgence, it was necessary to make a temporary use of our credit for one-half the amount of our existing resources. Such was the origin of the Treasury note act of October.

The present embarrassment of the Treasury does not arise from any deficiency of resources, but from the mode of executing the act of October. The rate of interest on the notes was discretionary with the President, not exceeding six per cent. per annum. Had he directed none to be issued under six per cent. most of them would have been taken up by capitalists or remitted abroad, the Treasury would have been protected, and no supplementary act would have been necessary. But there existed a suspension of specie payments, a derangement of exchanges, and severe commercial embarrassment. The immediate interest of the Treasury was deemed subordinate to the general interests of the country. These interests were consulted by furnishing the public debtors with an additional medium of payment, and different sections of the Union with facilities of exchange. Nearly two millions were issued at a nominal rate of interest, nearly three at two per cent. and over four millions at five per cent. They were consequently paid into the Treasury nine months before they were due; and this is the origin of its temporary embarrassment.

There is nothing, sir, in the past or present condition of the Treasury, nor in the prospect ahead, to warrant this charge of bankruptcy, or to authorize a public debt. In October last, although we had drawn eight-and-twenty millions from the Federal Treasury and transferred it to the States, we had still due us six millions from the United States Bank, eight millions from the deposite banks, and six millions from our merchants, making twenty millions. In January last, with little more than two millions of our credit outstanding, we had due us and in the Treasury eighteen millions; and at this moment, if the debts due us from our banks and merchants, arising from the revenue of former years, were paid, we should have a balance of fifteen millions in the Treasury, even after paying off five millions and a half of Treasury notes.

The resources of the year, too, are sufficient to meet every demand upon the Treasury for ordinary and extraordinary purposes, if the act of October is carried into effect. On the 1st of January we had half a million in the Treasury. The Treasury notes not then issued amounted to seven millions. The amount receivable from merchants and banks in 1838 is about ten millions, and if the revenue from customs and lands should amount to fifteen millions and a half, (being three millions less than the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury,) the aggregate resources of the year would be thirty-three millions of dollars. In a long session the appropriations are made at a late period. It is not, therefore, probable that the demands upon the Treasury, during the year, will exceed thirty-one millions.

Should, however, the resources of the year fall below the foregoing estimate, or the demands upon the Treasury exceed even thirty-three millions, we should still not be justified in resorting to a loan while we have a reserved fund of seven millions and a half due us in 1839 and '40 from the deposit banks and the Bank of the United States.

As to the prospect of our future revenue every thing is encouraging. Confidence and trade are evidently reviving. We must not anticipate years of stagnation because such succeeded the revulsion of 1819. There is no resemblance whatever between the condition of the country in 1815 and 1835. At the former period we had passed through eight years of commercial restrictions and war. Millions of capital had been suddenly transferred to new channels. Confidence had been destroyed and trade impoverished for years. Such was our condition in 1815, when we suddenly commenced a wild career of speculation, which was continued through 1816 and '17, and arrested in 1818. The revulsion of 1819 prostrated all classes and trades, and paralyzed every section of the country. But such was not our condition in 1835, when the speculations of that and the following year commenced. These were founded on a vast and solid capital, the accumulations of twenty years of peace and prosperity. The revulsion of 1837 overwhelmed trade, but there never was a period when the country possessed more substantial wealth, or enjoyed more general prosperity. Some cities in the Union, where they have attempted to postpone the payment of the debts, may yet suffer, but in the present prosperous condition of the country trade must soon revive.

There are other and gratifying evidences of a restoration of confidence and a revival of trade. Our northern banks have resumed specie payments earlier than was anticipated twelve months ago, and much earlier than they would have done had this Administration yielded to the demands of trade. We can now, sir, look back calmly upon the events of the past year, and judge the conduct of all parties. The time is rapidly approaching, when intelligent and candid men will do justice to this Administration, for its firmness in rejecting the counsels of fear, and in disregarding the denunciations of phrenzy—for its elevated patriotism in sacrificing temporary popularity to preserve the supremacy of the laws and the permanent welfare of the Union. Had the President faltered for one moment—had he imitated the timid and temporizing policy of some of our State Governments—had he adopted the suggestions of some of the statesmen of both houses of Congress—had he yielded one inch of constitutional ground, violated the laws, and sanctioned the collection of the revenue in depreciated State bank paper—who could have anticipated the period when the banks of any State in the Union could have resumed specie payments? The firmness and wisdom of the Executive have saved us from years of embarrassment, and from a precedent which would have proved equally fatal to our currency and destructive of all integrity among men. The country will do justice to all who disregard considerations of popularity when called upon to discharge the highest of constitutional duties.

This resumption, sir, is powerfully sustained, and our northern banks have nothing to fear. At no former period have our foreign exchanges and currency been so well fortified. They are strongly sustained by an annually increasing export of cotton, and a tide of emigration to this continent. Latterly the stocks and bonds of every kind transmitted abroad for investment, form what is equivalent to a heavy item in our export trade. But a collateral aid, of no ordinary power, has suddenly fortified the banks in their resolution to resume specie payments. The troubles in Canada, the establishment of a Vice Royalty, and the introduction of a British army to sustain it, must sensibly affect our foreign exchanges, as they have done already. This is no temporary aid. The Government now established in Canada may be considered as permanent, while Great Britain holds her Northern possessions, and such a Government can only be supported at an expense of many millions annually. All these causes combined must create a heavy draft upon Great Britain for merchandise and specie. The latter is protected by our coin law of 1834, which encourages the importation of European gold, and tends to secure its circulation in this country. All the banks in the Union may now resume with safety, except the Southwestern. These will not resume till it ceases to be the interest of the cotton-speculating-banks to depreciate the currencies of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

But among the most encouraging events of the day, is that great reform measure—the free banking law of New York. The passage of that act ought to be a subject of general congratulation; for whatever animates the centre, must give an impulse to every part of our commercial system. The union which has so long existed—the mutually embarrassing and corrupting union—between banking and legislation, is dissolved, and, I trust, forever. The question is not entirely settled. Whether paper, when substituted for the current coin of the country, is a public or private concern, is a question which remains to be adjusted hereafter. It would have been well, too, had these associations been founded on unlimited responsibility. But the great commercial point is gained. It is now the legitimate office of trade, and not the officious province of Government, to regulate the amount of capital which trade may deem it expedient at any time to employ in the business of banking. This simple and just proposition has been wisely appreciated, and successfully acted upon, for more than a century in Scotland. It was introduced into England in 1826, and must eventually become the policy of every enlightened Government.

The free banking law of New York must not only affect sensibly the trade of the Union, but operate more powerfully than all our legislative experiments, State or Federal, upon the exchanges, and local currencies of the States. Trade, which can alone regulate exchanges, has been chained down by restrictions at the centre of its power and of our circulations. New York has been, from the commencement of our Government, the victim of unjust and oppressive legislation, State and Federal. This Government has made two experiments—in 1791 and in 1816—to create an artificial centre of trade and circulation. It has attempted by the mere power of law to place the commercial metropolis of the Union—the natural centre and regulator of its exchanges and commercial system—under the control and direction of a Federal banker-general. While we were thus treated by the Federal Government, our own State Government denied us even the humble privilege of defending ourselves. We were not permitted to exercise our natural right to regulate the amount of our banking capital. The State Government usurped this office, and we were only allowed to employ about one-fifth of the amount necessary to sustain our own credit, and the exchanges of the Union. When our periodical revulsions came, the pressure of our credits did not fall upon the point selected by the Federal Government, but the whole commercial system of the United States pressed upon New York, the natural centre of exchanges. We had no banking capital adequate to the pressure, and trade was prostrated. We are now free. Banking will hereafter keep pace with and regulate all other trades; and increase in a ratio to the accumulation of wealth, and enlargement of commercial credit. Prepared at the natural centre of trade with a broad foundation of banking capital, we shall be ready to receive the pressure of commercial credit, and to moderate the shock of every revulsion. We need no chartered regulator State or Federal. Our own banking law, the perpetual charter of free trade, is all we require to bid defiance to all hostility, protect ourselves, and regulate exchanges. It is for our interest and the interest of the country that the Federal Government should never again unite banking with legislation, and that it should confine itself to its constitutional duty of regulating the coinage, and preserving a broad and solid basis for the local currencies of our confederacy.

With such evidences of a revival of confidence, and trade, and an increase of revenue, and with outstanding resources more than equal to any amount we now require, we are not authorized to resort to loans, or to make any other than a temporary use of our credit, by carrying into effect the Treasury note act of October last. As to the sale of the two bonds of the Bank of the United States, even if practicable at all to dispose of bonds of the denomination of two millions each, it would not answer the purpose of this bill; nor, at this time, afford any relief whatever to the Treasury. The Treasury will have collected a sufficient amount of its postponed debts to pay off all the Treasury notes, before the amount could be realized from the sale of these bonds. That proposition is not designed, however, to interfere with this bill; for it is admitted not to be the measure the Treasury now requires. Should such sale be authorized and effected, it will, however, so far diminish the amount of Treasury notes to be issued.

The measure proposed is the only one applicable to the actual condition of the Treasury. I am aware of, and justly appreciate, the general objections to Treasury notes. I concur with gentlemen, that where there is a deficiency of resources, Treasury notes ought not to be substituted for a direct loan. We are not, however, in that condition, and are not, therefore, justified in creating a public debt. Treasury notes of no denomination should be issued to raise money, when there are no immediate resources existing to redeem them. They never should be issued of small denomination to circulate as currency. These notes are not designed for either of these purposes. We have resources in hand to redeem them, and notes of fifty dollars and upwards cannot interfere with the circulation of our current coin.

Our case, sir, is simply this: we are to receive before the close of the year a sufficient amount from the banks and the merchants to redeem all the notes we may authorize, and we propose to make a temporary use of our credit to avoid the necessity of a loan, for which we have no occasion whatever. We only ask the benefit of the Treasury Note act of October last. Upon a question of such obvious expediency, I shall no longer detain the committee.

Mr. CUSHING said he rejoiced to perceive that trade was reviving, and that the banks were resuming specie payments; and he deprecated the action of any banks to resist the resumption of specie payments for political or other purposes. He referred to the observation of Mr. CAMBRELENG that the measures of the Government had produced this effect, and inquired what the Government had done to promote a revival of trade, or to aid or encourage the banks to resume the payment of specie. He said that after the Government had found itself in a deplorable minority, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAMER,] had offered a resolution declaring that the Government would give aid to such banks as should resume. He [Mr. C.] had offered a similar resolution, but both had been rejected by the votes of the friends of the Administration.

He referred to the action of the State of New York, and especially to the private banking act of that State, and contended that the final effect was doubtful. The measure might be prosperous—he hoped it would; but it might be adverse, and no one could yet tell which; and he argued, that the private banking act, so far from being a separation of the banks and the Government, was entirely the reverse. The Comptroller was authorized to issue Government bank notes to the private banking corporations, upon a pledge of security to the State for their redemption; and if the banking company failed to redeem them, the Government undertook to do it, out of the securities placed in their hands; and that act constituted the Comptroller the greatest banker and the greatest Government banker he had ever known. The Comptroller was allowed to issue these notes of the State, to the amount of millions, under his own sole control, and and he considered the act a reunion, a remarriage, under the strictest matrimonial bands, between Government and banks. He referred to two bills heretofore reported for the issuing of Treasury notes, and expressed a desire to know what was to be done with them. One of them was intended to authorize what he called loan certificates, payable at a future day, and, while they could be issued as a legal tender to public creditors, they would be refused in payment of duties and for the public lands, which might, at the same time, be exacted, and, in fact, collected in specie.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said these bills had been recommitted and abandoned by the committee as not necessary in the present state of the country. The committee had come to the conclusion that the bill before the committee was all that the exigency now required.

Mr. CUSHING said he was glad to be informed of that fact; and then went on to comment upon the remark that the present bill was simple. He said it was simple, and that was an objectionable feature. Some things, in appearance simple, were found in their operation to be exceedingly complex. The Secretary of the Treasury was to be authorized to issue ten millions of Treasury notes, and he could not understand under what limitations or restrictions. He wished the bill to be explicit and guarded, that he might be able to understand the limits of the power of the Treasury. He contended that the measure proposed had always been considered of a doubtful and dangerous character by all the friends of democratic institutions, and that Madison and others had always been opposed to issues of Government paper, founded not on funds or specie, but upon faith or credit, and only consented to its expediency in remarkable exigencies. He considered that the notes would be a currency, as much as bank notes. They would be issued to pass from hand to hand, in the payment of debts, and would, in effect, be money, and would enter into the system of exchanges. But he objected to such issues, because they would always tend to depreciate. Experience had shown that whatever interest they might bear, whether one mill or six per cent. they would not be above the value of the notes of good banks. These notes would be useful in the payment of duties; and so were notes of specie-paying banks, which would be equally as valuable. The interest, he contended, would not enhance their value. He had also doubts whether the Government had the constitutional right to issue bills of credit; for he maintained that these Treasury notes were bills of credit. They were not a loan, but only an issue of paper, founded on nothing but the faith and credit of the Government, against which the constitutional objection holds good.

Mr. C. said he was not prepared to decide that this was not the best expedient in the exigency of the times. He wished for information, and trusted it would be given to him in the course of the debate. But there were other plans to relieve the Government from its pecuniary embarrassment; and he alluded to the proposition to sell the bonds of the United States Bank, which, he said, would yield four millions of dollars, and would fill up the gap in the resources of the Treasury, which would render it unnecessary to recur to the doubtful and dangerous expedient now under consideration. He concluded by again protesting against assuming to the Government the credit of the returning prosperity of the country, which was no more attributable to them than the rise of the tides or the revolutions of the planets.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, spoke at length in relation to the unconstitutionality and inexpediency of the measure, which he considered of an infinitely prejudicial and injurious tendency. He explained the nature of bills of credit, and contended that these notes were bills of credit; and that, if they were in conformity with the Constitution, every State Government might issue similar notes. He intimated a proposition, which he said he should not move, but if it could be done by the friends of the Administration, he would pledge himself and many of his friends to vote for it; that was, if the Government was suffering from pecuniary embarrassment, to make a loan, directly and properly, in England or Germany, if it could not not be done in this country in the notes of specie-paying banks; and he went at length into a consideration of many commercial and financial subjects.

Before Mr. T. had concluded, he gave way to

Mr. UNDERWOOD, who moved that the committee rise, which was agreed to—55 to 53; and the committee rose and reported.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an adjournment.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. HAYNES moved a call of the House, but the first motion taking precedence was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 69;

And so the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, May 11, 1838.

Mr. PIERCE presented a memorial from Amherst, New Hampshire, signed by 41 citizens of that town, whom he said he knew to be persons of intelligence and respectability, remonstrating against the execution of the late Cherokee treaty: laid on the table.

Messrs. MORRIS, NILES, SOUTHARD and DAVIS also presented memorials on the same subject, which were disposed of in a like manner.

Mr. DAVIS presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, in opposition to the annexation of Texas to the Union; which were laid on the table.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of Mrs. Ann Prettyman, of Baltimore, praying for a pension in consideration of the military services of her late husband during the last war with Great Britain: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of sundry citizens of South Carolina, praying for the establishment of a new post route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Delaware county, Ohio, relating to the Wyoming sufferers, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the memorial of sundry citizens of Medina, Ohio, asking a modification of the post office law in reference to the transmission of newspapers by mail: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of Ann Pinkman, praying a pension compensation for the Revolutionary services of her late husband: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MOUTON, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing goods, wares and merchandise imported into the United States to be warehoused: read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RIVES, on leave, introduced a bill for the reorganization of the Marine Corps; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the resolution to retain copies of original papers that may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, reported the same as amended, and, on motion of Mr. H. the resolution was considered, and, with the amendment, agreed to.

Mr. H. from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of William Bennett, the bill for the relief of John Richie, and the bill for the relief of John L. Scott, reported the same severally, without amendment, and recommending that they be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. H. from the same committee, reported favorably on the bill for the relief of David McNair.

On motion of Mr. H the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Pierre Menard and others.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Joseph Paxton, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the use of his office, one copy of the American State Papers, title Public Lands, published by Duff Green.

Mr. ROBBINS submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, as soon as conveniently may be, the amount of goods imported into the United States on and from the 10th day of May, 1837, up to the 10th day of May, 1838.

Also, the amount of duties received and to be received on said importations for and during the same period.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the bill for the relief of Hard and Longstreet was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, after being explained and advocated by Messrs. PRESTON and ROBINSON, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The report of the Committee on Indian Affairs on the subject of the letter of the Secretary of War recommending the survey and assignment of the lands west of the Mississippi, set apart for the emigrant Indians, adverse to the proposition contained in said letter, was considered and concurred in.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs unfavorable to the petition of William Bellason, was considered and concurred in; but subsequently, on the motion of Mr. MERRICK, the Senate agreed to reconsider the vote, and the report was again laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of Anthony Gale was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and, on motion of Mr. KING it was indefinitely postponed.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia was taken up as the unfinished business.

Mr. NILES spoke for some time against the dangerous tendency of these chartered moneyed monopolies, which were fraught with injury to the community at large. He thought when they presented themselves to Congress to ask a renewal of their charters, that they should at least come with clean hands. Was this the case in the present instance? He thought not. These banks had suspended; he cared not whether from political motives, or from their own rottenness; but it was plain that they had twice suspended, and he was for going into the conduct of institutions that should be held responsible to the people for their fair and open dealing.

Mr. N. said it was as necessary to look back to see how the affairs of these banks had been conducted, as to look into their present condition. Some of them, he said, had depreciated their own stock, and gone into the market to purchase it up at reduced prices to the great loss of individuals. Yes, the directors of one of these banks, with a full knowledge of the state of their finances, and from which the public were shut out, had obtained the stock at forty, fifty, and sixty dollars in the hundred, from the innocent holders, many of whom were widows and orphans, and now came to Congress to ask us to renew their charters, by which the very stock would be brought up to par value. Under such circumstances, were they to do it, would it not be in a manner consummating their fraud? Mr. N. contended that the banks had profited largely by their own abuses. He had been told in some cases, even after the suspension had taken place, that large additional issues had been made for the very purpose of being bought up. Mr. N. read from a report of a committee of the House of Representatives, drawn up by Mr. Thomas, the chairman, and some of the testimony taken on that occasion, to prove what had been charged upon them. He referred to the testimony of Wm. Jewell, of Georgetown, a director in the Farmers and Mechanics Bank in that place, and to that of Mr. Todd and others, directors in the city banks. He did not know that the report did apply to all the banks; but it certainly did to some of them. Before these institutions were rechartered it became the duty of the Senate to look well into their conduct.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that he should be pleased to vote for this bill, and should vote for it, if it was placed in such a condition as he thought it ought to be. He could not, and would not, vote for it as it stood at present. Without troubling the Senate at length with any remarks, he intended to propose two or three amendments, which he deemed cardinal, and if they failed, so far as his individual voice was concerned, the bill should be rejected. In the first place, he would move to strike out the second section of the bill, which was as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the said bank shall not exceed five hundred thousand dollars, to be divided into twenty-five thousand shares of twenty dollars each; that certificates of stock shall be issued for the capital now actually paid in at that rate; and that, from time to time, as new shares may be subscribed for, prior to the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, certificates therefor may be issued at that rate per share: Provided, The same shall be paid in specie.

He did not wish to introduce any general political topics into this small discussion; but he appealed to gentlemen of all sides whether three millions of capital was not enormous for a District containing 38,000 people, with very little commerce, agriculture, or manufactures. The single county in which he resided contained more than double the population of this District, and it was emphatically commercial all along the banks of the Susquehanna river; and yet, if it were proposed to give to that county three millions of banking capital, the people would be startled. The capital of these banks was already too great, though he did not propose to diminish it. His single purpose in moving to strike out this section was to ascertain whether the Senate was willing to increase the capital of these $200,000. There were then one or two other amendments which he proposed to offer, after the question on this was decided.

Mr. ROANE was opposed to striking out the second section. It granted to the bank the capital it now had, and gave it an opportunity of increasing its capital to the amount of $500,000. By a reference to the document on the table, it would be seen what was the actual capital of these banks. He took it for granted there would be no danger in increasing their stock, as it would not be taken up, unless it should be found to be a profitable investment. There was one thing in the memorial of this bank that struck him. They looked forward to new sources of prosperity in the trade that will be opened by the completion of their great canal. The District would then probably have a considerable commerce, and it struck him that the capital, limited as it was in the bill, was not too large. Mr. R. explained that the stock of this bank was originally $500,000, but it had been lessened by taking it in payment of debts due it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, as this was a test question, he would ask for the yeas and nays on it. They were accordingly ordered.

After some remarks from Mr. WILLIAMS,

Mr. HUBBARD said he was sorry when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROANE] so strenuously opposed the amendment. It was certainly a new thing to him for a corporation to purchase in its own stock. All the object of the Senator from Pennsylvania was to limit the capital to what is now used in the practical operations of the institution; and all he wanted was to have the second section so amended as to produce that result. Should it hereafter happen, either from a discontinuance of other banks, or from the increased business of the District, that more capital can be usefully employed, Congress would no doubt authorize the necessary increase. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] had quoted from the report made in the House of Representatives, showing gross misconduct on the part of these banks. But the Senator might have found a report emanating from a committee of this body, which gave a very different character to these institutions. That report showed what was the cause of the suspensions that had been so much censured, and the conduct of the banks under it. In short, the committee, after the fullest investigation, expressed the opinion that these banks were safe, sound, and solvent, and ought to be rechartered. This opinion, he believed, was that generally entertained by the citizens of this District. Mr. H. spoke very favorably of the conduct of the Bank of Washington in specie payments, and said that this bank at least was not liable to the censures that had been cast on the banks of the District.

Mr. KING said he was a member of this committee, and he, together with others of the same committee had given the subject a thorough examination. At the time he was much prejudiced against these institutions, from reasons which he had heard, and consequently, had taken particular care to see whether any political or other improper influence had been made to operate on these banks, and so far as he was concerned, he would take upon himself to assert unequivocally, that no such motives could be found. The directors and others concerned took every step to satisfy the committee in relation to their business at the time of the temporary suspension alluded to by the Senator from Connecticut. He thought that gentleman must be entirely mistaken, when he said that these banks were purchasing up their own notes at a discount; on the contrary, he thought it would be seen, that they were endeavoring to regulate their affairs in the best manner for the interests of the stockholders, and that when their notes were at a discount they had taken the pains to assure the holders of them, that their condition was safe.

Mr. K. also apprehended that the Senator was equally mistaken in relation to the stock said to have been purchased up. He might be wrong, but he thought it would be found, that in relation to that matter, that individuals in debt to the banks, had agreed that the banks should take their stock in payment of their debt, at par value, and thus it was that their capital in many instances had been reduced.

Mr. K. went much in detail in relation to all the matters connected with the bill, and said he believed it prepared with much caution, and to be as well guarded as any other in the country. He expressed a wish that the Senate would take up the bill, with a view to aid the people of this unfortunate district in their present embarrassment, and not permit their minds to be improperly prejudiced against these institutions.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that so far as he was concerned, this bill should either pass to-day, or be rejected. He did not wish the subject delayed. Every Senator understood the subject, and he should therefore limit himself to offering a few amendments, and explaining their object. The Senator from New Hampshire thought they had better preserve the second section. He thought otherwise. It provided for new stock, and he wanted the old stock and the old stockholders to remain as they now were, and to prohibit them from going beyond it. The stock was now $334,000, and he moved to make it $335,000.

After some remarks from Messrs. WEBSTER and WILLIAMS—

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should not reply to the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, farther than to say that he thought that if he would institute a comparison between the banking capital of any State in the Union and that in this District, when it will have three millions of dollars, he will find a difference of more than forty per cent. Mr. B. did most solemnly believe that the banking capital of this District was already too large. The banks themselves had found that the amount they held would not be profitable, and therefore they took it in, in payment of debts due them. He was willing to take them as they now were; to give them the capitals which they had fixed upon themselves; and if there should be an increase of business in this District, a state of things which no man wished to see more than himself, then it would be time for Congress to increase their capitals, as it no doubt would. Besides, though he was not about to condemn these banks, he did not think their conduct had been such as to give them any claims for an increase of stock. As to the Patriotic Bank, he would have no objection to giving them a capital of $200,000. But he would be unwilling to go beyond that amount, or to give to a population of the size of that comprised within this District, a banking capital of three millions of dollars.

Mr. MERRICK advocated the renewal of the charters of the several banks. He thought the amount of capital asked for was not too much for the business concerns of this great and growing District. It did not, in his opinion, bear a comparison with that employed in other parts of the Union of like population and business. It was to be recollected that in this District there were three growing cities, the commerce and inland trade of two of which, Georgetown and Alexandria, were greatly on the increase; and when he looked forward to the works of internal improvement which in a few years would be finished, there would be a still greater demand for bank capital. The whole subject in relation to these banks had been so fully and so fairly set before the Senate by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] as to leave little more to be said by Mr. M. He concluded by expressing a hope that the wishes of the people might be acceded to.

Mr. DAVIS spoke generally in favor of the renewal of these charters, and went at large into the practice of banking, as pursued in his own State. With regard to the details of the bill, and the amount of capital necessary, it would depend on the amount of business. He thought it a much greater injury to have the capital too small than too large; a small amount of capital to do a large business would give a monopoly to the few. So far as his experience went, he thought the safer and best mode to pursue, to secure all the benefits of banking to a community, was a large amount of capital vested in several institutions, in which case competition was excited, and each one stood on its good behavior. In his State experience had justified making a number of banks rather than creating one with an immense amount of capital. Mr. D. contended that banks could have no motive to purchase up their own stock, as had been suggested by the Senator from Connecticut.

After some remarks from Mr. HUBBARD,

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was willing to accommodate the Senator from New Hampshire, and therefore he would modify his motion, so as to leave the second section in the bill, and to amend it by making the capital of this bank $335,000, to be divided into 16,750 shares, of $20 dollars each, instead of a capital of $500,000, divided into 25,000 shares of the same amount.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that he was a member of the same committee with the Senator from Alabama, and well recollected the care with which the whole matter was looked into by every member of that committee, many of whom were deeply prejudiced, and none he believed entirely free from it. That investigation had resulted in the full and entire conviction that there was no just ground of censure, either as to political motives, or any intention on the part of the stockholders or agents of the banks to defraud or injure the public; that if there were any faults they were those only common to pecuniary men. In the course of the debate allusions had been made to all the banks applying at the same time for their charters. This was not the fault of the institutions, but the will of Congress that desired to so place them that the charters should expire at the same time.

Mr. S. found nothing to condem in the practice of the banks taking their own stock. Individuals that wanted money sometimes pledged it as collateral security, in a d of other securities for the accommodations they wanted, and failing to pay their notes the bank took the stock.

Mr. S. thought the amount of capital asked for not too large; there were two banks in Alexandria, and two in Georgetown, whose capital was scarcely adequate for the accommodation necessary to the wants of the increased business, the growing commerce, and inland trade of those two thriving and flourishing towns. Mr. S. had heard a bank in this city condemned because it was a specie-paying bank. There was, to his mind, a strange inconsistency on the part of certain Senators in relation to these matters. At one time the banks were denounced en masse as swindling, fraudulent concerns; since which, the banks of New York had contracted their circulation, and became specie-paying banks, and were lauded to the skies as worthy of all imitation, while the Bank of Washington in this city, which had pursued the same plan, and by prudently curtailing its circulation, was enabled to redeem its notes, is denounced as the most culpable of all, and we have been told that the Senate was not to be "bamboozled" by such a pretension. "Bamboozled," he did not know the meaning of the word, unless from the sense in which it had been applied; nor did he know from what lexicographer it was derived.

Mr. BENTON observed, in reply, that he had an authority before him which might be serviceable on the present occasion, and he saw no reason why he should not use it; especially when by doing so he could enlighten a member of that body. Whenever he could speak from a book he liked to do it; and if he did not speak like a book, he was always glad to speak from one. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] had taken notice of a word which he [Mr. B.] used three times yesterday, with a full knowledge of its meaning, and with a knowledge, also, that it was to be found in the best authors in the English language. As the Senator professed not to know the meaning of the word, he would read for his information the definition of it in Johnson's Dictionary. Mr. B. then read:

"Bamboozle, v. a. to deceive, to impose upon, to confound."

Then, said Mr. B. there is appended to this definition an illustration, taken from Dr. Arbuthnot, who, though a very able and celebrated writer, was not a voluminous one. The illustration was somewhat curious, and perhaps susceptible of present application; it was in these words:

"After Nich. had bamboozled about the money, John called for the counters."

Then, said Mr. B. after the verb active, is the substantive, "a bamboozler," defined as "a tricky fellow, a cheat;" and the illustration from the same author is: "there are a set of fellows called banterers and bamboozlers that play such tricks."

Yes, sir, said Mr. B. "Nick" has bamboozled us about the money to some purpose, and when a "set of fellows played such tricks" as to pretend to pay specie for their notes while they had no notes in circulation, it was not out of the way to call them "bamboozlers." When he used the word yesterday, he meant it to imply that a deception had been practised—the thing which was not. He used it in reference to a bank which purported to pay specie for its notes whi e it had none in circulation; and he should, as an officer of the Government, acting under the deposite law, or as a legislator, tell any bank which came before him representing itself as a specie-paying bank, while it had no notes out to pay, that it did not tell the truth; he should let it know that it was a "bamboozler," whether its name was "Nick" or not. As to the trifling amount of the notes of this bank which the Senator from New Jersey represented its books show as outstanding, he presumed that it was the small amount which had been lost in the hands of the draymen and the washerwomen, and were never to come in at all; being so far a clear gain to the bank. He spoke to a Senate which had been five months in existence, and he asked of its members if they ever saw any of the notes of this bank? Our checks, said he, go to it every day, and I should have been glad to have got their notes, as they purported to pay specie for them. The gentleman from Massachusetts opposite him, [Mr. DAVIS,] yesterday, in speaking of the assumption by this bank that it paid specie, without indeed calling it a case of "bamboozlement," admitted that it was a case of "humbuggery." Yes, sir, it is the worst species of humbuggery. He took his ground yesterday, and stated that he preferred the bank which paid out its own notes, though it did not pay specie, to a bank which purported to pay specie, while it had no notes in circulation, and paid out the irredeemable notes of other banks. He preferred the bank which did not become the conductor of the notes of others, by which he knew that he could sue them if they did not meet their responsibilities. He hoped he should hear no mere remarks on this subject. Several gentlemen had represented him as not being contented with the banks which did not redeem their notes, and at the same time dissatisfied with those that did pay. He hoped gentlemen would not continue to represent him in this point of view. He wished all who read what was said here, to understand him as alluding to banks which represented themselves as specie paying banks, while they did not and could not pay specie, because they had taken care to have no notes out.

The Senator from New Jersey, in alluding to the testimony cited by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES] meets it by general encomiums on the conduct of these banks at an anterior period. What became of these general encomiums when there were specific charges of misconduct that had been admitted? There was the sworn testimony of the directors of these banks themselves, in which these charges were substantiated. Every gentleman knew what the law was in reference to persons who, having secret knowledge inaccessible to the rest of the community, went out and made purchases at a profit. Here were bank directors by whose resolves the bank stops, and by whose resolves the bank resumes again; they had the game in their own hands; they depress by suspension of payment the value of the notes and stock, and then buy it up, and having bought it, resume payment and raise it again. And here, he would observe, they put themselves in the situation of those who, having secret knowledge not possessed by the community at large, went out and made their purchases at a large profit, and in which there was no court of equity that would not set aside the sales. Now, he said, they were called on not only to sanction the purchases thus made, but to reward them. Take, for example, the testimony of one of these directors—William Jewell, director of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, sworn to by himself. He says: "The bank failed during my absence in Baltimore, and on my return I told Mr. William W. Corcoran that I wished to purchase its stock," &c. [The testimony went on to say that Mr. Corcoran informed him of a widow lady who had $15,000 worth of stock, and that he purchased it through Mr. Corcoran's agency, giving her Georgetown property for it assessed at $8,000.]

Here, said Mr. B. was the director's own story, and sworn to by him. Let the widow, said Mr. B. go before any court of equity, and carry nothing but this piece of paper, and the judge will set aside the sale, because the purchaser not only had secret knowledge of the value of this stock, unknown to the seller, but he could raise and depress it at his pleasure. Mr. B. said he had never yet seen a bank established, but it came in advance with a host of widows and orphans petitioning for its charter, and yet, in the end, these widows and orphans were the first to be fleeced. Every part of banking was profitable, and none more so than the explosion, when the widow and the orphan and the laborer became the prey of the more sharp sighted speculator. He, Mr. B. was astonished at the efforts made on that floor to crush the evidence made by the directors of these banks themselves, and to counteract it by general evidence in their favor, made at an anterior period. The Senator from Connecticut said that there was evidence here to show that these banks, during the time of suspension and depreciation of their notes, put out more notes to be shaved back again into bank; and here, said Mr. B. is the oath of a director to prove it, supported by the resolve of the bank, under which the issue was authorized. Here was a piece of conduct on a par with that by which the widow's stock was taken from her at half its value; and, if he were the chancellor that the case came before, the widow should have her property back again in as short a time as it would take to make a decree. The sworn testimony of Mr. Todd, one of the directors, showed that, at the time his bank stopped, its notes were put out by a resolve of the bank to be shaved back again.

[Mr. B. here read the testimony.]

Thus it would be seen that one of these banks, the very day after it stopped, agreed to gives its notes to its depositors; and the notes being thus given out, were purchased up by Mr. Prout, a broker.

[Mr. B. then read the testimony of Mr. Prout, showing the prices at which he bought stock and notes, viz: 50 and 75 cents in the dollar, and that he purchased notes to the amount of $80,000, which he sold again at a small profit.]

Sir, said Mr. B. I was here at the time, and know how these notes were depreciated, and how the holders had to sacrifice them; how they were got out of the hands of the timid, the helpless, and the ignorant, at half their value. Mr. Prout said that he made frequent sales of the notes he purchased to the directors of these banks, by whose resolves they had become depreciated; among whom were William A. Bradley, president of the Patriotic Bank, and Raphael Semmes, a director of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown. To some of these gentlemen he sold such notes, and took in payment their promissory notes, at long dates. He further said that Mr. Clement Smith, president of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, and Mr. Wm. A. Bradley, president of the Bank of Washington, offered to exchange property with him for any amount of these notes he could get. There was a good deal of other testimony in this volume, which he would not now take up the time of the Senate to read. He would, however, advert to the letter of the officer who made payment to the hands employed at Harper's Ferry. This officer, having a draft on the Farmer's and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, received of that bank the amount necessary to make his payment, in its own notes, and went straight up to Harper's Ferry for that purpose. He was to have paid the money out on Saturday; but in consequence of the pay rolls not being prepared, he could not make his payments on that day; and on Sunday, the news arrived that the bank had stopped. Without that intervention, this worthless money would have been paid out to the men whose arms were employed from sunrise to sunset, and whose wives and children were waiting for the proceeds of their labor. So far as the bank was concerned, the fraud was consummated. It gave out this money with a full knowledge that it would stop payment, and that it was to be paid out to those who earned their bread with the sweat of their brows—men whose arms were going from morning till night. It was an attempt to rob men whose wives and children depended on their daily labor. Are we, asked Mr. B. to stand here and give rewards for conduct such as this? conduct which is punished in every court of justice in the civilized world? If so, there should at least be heard some voices against it, invoking the attention of the American people to what they were doing.

The immediate question before the Senate was as to the increase of the capital of these banks. He cared little about it. There was already more capital here—moonshine—than could be used. Read the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, and you will find, Mr. B. said, that the capital of these banks has literally rotted down, and you are now asked to increase it.

It was a case in which a capital of a million more or less made no difference. It was in a District which had neither commerce, manufactures, nor agriculture, and in which the Federal Government poured out its money as bountifully as the rain from heaven; and, therefore, there was no need for a banking capital. The charter provided that for every dollar of specie paid in, the banks may issue four dollars of circulation; therefore, they might issue eight millions under their present capitals, and yet gentlemen wanted to give them the power to issue more. Mr. B. here entered into a calculation to show the quantity of circulation estimated by writers on political economy to be necessary for a given population, and to show that the present capitals of the banks were much too large for the wants of a population of the size of that of this District.

There was no possible way, he said, in which they could profitably employ or consume the amount of these capitals. If I lend my money, said he, I am to get six per cent. lawful interest for it; but these banks, for every silver dollar they have, may lend out four, and thus draw twenty-four per cent. interest; and yet it is said that it is not enough. I now, said Mr. B. take the position of which I spoke some time ago; and that is, to maintain that the banking system of the United States is the most unsolid and the most delusive in the world, and that nowhere in the United States is it more unsolid and more delusive than in this District. He meant to offer some amendments to this bill to make it a little safer for the community, and he would bring them forward at the proper time. For the present, he merely rose for the purpose of illuminating the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] as to the meaning of the word "bamboozle," and to help out his friend from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] who, by the way, seldom needed helping out, by explaining that the testimony which he read was the sworn testimony of these bank directors themselves, and not to be invalidated by general testimony given long before.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that, having been upon the committee which reported the bill under consideration, he felt it due to himself to say that he was opposed to the renewal of the charters of the banks in the District of Columbia, for the reasons that the corporators, having enjoyed the benefits of the privileges conferred upon them during the periods for which the charters were granted, they ought now to wind up their concerns, collect and pay their debts, and divide what may remain among their stockholders; and, if there be any benefits resulting from such charters, allow others the privilege of participating in those benefits. Why should the stockholders of these banks have a monopoly of all the banking privileges in the District? Are not others as well entitled to such privileges as the stockholders in these banks? Most of these banks have existed more than twenty years, and it would seem that the persons interested in them have had their full share of privileges; but, be that as it may, they have enjoyed the benefits conferred upon them for the period for which the charters were granted; and now that the charters are about to expire, why should these corporators have a preference for the coming twenty years? Have they any claim to an extension? They have already had the benefit of the full term agreed on, and cannot complain if Congress should think proper not to renew or extend their charters.

But aside from this consideration, he contended that good policy and the best interest of all concerned, require that corporations should enjoy all the benefits conferred upon them by their charters for the term for which they are granted; and when that term shall expire, no claim for a renewal shall be recognized. If a charter be beneficial, the granters will thus have all that was proposed or granted to them; and there is no claim on their part for a continuance of the monopoly. Others have as high and stronger claims than they to future participation of the favors of Government; besides, it will, in most cases, prove better for the public, and more for the interest of the corporations, that their affairs shall be settled up and their concerns closed at the prescribed expiration of their charters, than to anticipate or realize renewals of them for indefinite periods. There must be a day of settlement, and, if it be well understood that bank charters are not to be renewed, such settlements will be seasonably provided for, and there will be less inconvenience and loss than would follow from the uncertainty whether or not a renewal could be obtained. If the existing banks require more time to collect their debts and to close their concerns, give to them as much as may be reasonable for those objects, but nothing more.

But the application of these banks for renewal and extension of their charters, is made under circumstances that, in his judgment, forbade the granting of them. These banks have suspended specie payments; and shall Congress, by renewing their charters, sanction this state of things? It is alleged that this suspension is not the result of any mismanagement peculiar to those banks, but the consequence of a general suspension throughout the country; and that it would be vain to expect that they could pay, when all others failed to pay; and there is much reason to believe it; but still the question recurs, shall Congress set an example to the country to recharter banks which do not pay their bills on presentment? He thought not; but a majority of the committee were disposed to renew these charters upon the terms and conditions prescribed in the bill reported; and if this be proper, the bill contains many provisions tending to secure the public against loss from any future operations of these banks, and with such amendments as he trusted would be made, will go very far to prevent future suspensions, and loss to creditors of these institutions.

In regard to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, he should vote for it, because it reduces the capital to the actual capital now used. He could see no reason for granting more than the bank finds it useful to operate upon, and if more capital shall hereafter be required, it may be granted to this institution, or to such others as Congress may be disposed to give it. It was not pretended before the committee that more banking capital is required for the business of the District than is now used by the existing banks, and it will be time enough to increase it when the business of the District shall demand it. As to banks owning, or purchasing in, their own stock, it is wrong in principle. If a bank may own part of its own capital, it may own the whole of it, and then the public have no security for its proper management. Stockholders will have withdrawn their capital and credit, and creditors will have what remains and nothing more. Whenever a bank shall meet with losses, it may be considered expedient for every stockholder to sell his stock to the bank, and leave the corporation to satisfy its creditors as the remaining means will warrant.

The question was then taken on Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment; and it was carried: yeas 29, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Conn. Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Roane, Robbins, Sevier, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster—12.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to further amend the bill, by inserting in the 29th section, after the word "circulation," the words, "and private deposites," the effect of which is to compel the banks to keep on hand an amount of coin equal to one-fourth of their private deposites, as well as of their circulation as in the bill.

Mr. BENTON observed that the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, touched a point which had occupied the attention of the most able financiers and political economists, both is this country and Europe. The subject had been before the House of Commons in England, and the sworn opinion of the present Governor of the Bank of England, as well as that of many men of eminence, had been taken on it. The document containing this information he had at home, and as he wished to use it, he would at this stage of the business move an adjournment.

Mr. NILES spoke in favor of the amendment, but said that he thought it did not go far enough. He proposed to add to it a proviso, to make the presidents and directors of the banks for the time being liable in their individual capacities to the holders of their bills, if they failed to conform to the provisions in this amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN declined accepting the modification proposed by the Senator from Connecticut; but observed that the gentleman could offer it as a separate amendment, after the question was taken on his, should it prevail.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The Senate the adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, May 12, 1838.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana was announced as having been appointed on the Committee on Private Land Claims to fill the vacancy occasioned by the decease of Mr. LAWLER.

ALLEGHANY RIVER.

The motion made some time since by Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to print 1500 extra copies of the report of the survey of the Alleghany river, was taken up as the first business in order, and, on the question of concurring therein, the vote was—ayes 46, noes 52: no quorum.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio hoped the business of the House would not be arrested by this matter, and he therefore moved to postpone it till Monday.

Mr. MERCER had rather it be not postponed, as the object was one of a very important character, and the expense involved was but trifling.

Mr. TALIAFERRO would vote for it if it would facilitate the work, but he was at a loss to perceive how the printing of 1500 extra copies of this work could effect the removal of a single stone.

Mr. MERCER and Mr. WHITTLESEY made a brief statement of the importance of the work, when the latter gentleman withdrew his motion.

Mr. POTTER said there has been no more important survey made for years under the orders of the National Government, than that of the Alleghany river; and the question now is, shall there be 1,500 copies of the report, chart, &c. published for information. The interests of various States are deeply involved in the navigation of this stream. Its first point of navigation for rafts, is in the State of New York; nay steamboats have occasionally gone to Olean point, and now weekly ascend from Pittsg to Warren, in Pennsylvania. The head waters of this stream penetrate into Western Pennsylvania and New York, and pass through a country abounding in the finest lumber in the world. At present, with all the difficulties that environ this navigation, the lumber of the Alleghany supplies that portion of the western prairie country, and the cities on the Ohio, Mississippi and Missouri, with this important and indispensable article. At St. Louis and Natchez, you will find the lumber yards supplied from the section of country through which this stream flows. In this point of view, the improvement is one of a national character: it is not confined to one or two States, but to numerous States. At present, the internal improvements of Pennsylvania connect this stream by canals and railroads with the Atlantic seaboard; and have commenced a work at Franklin, in Venango county, to connect it by a canal with Lake Erie. Thus that vast region of country, bordering upon the great inland seas, will, in fact, be supplied with the merchandise of the Atlantic seaboard through this channel, and the products of that rapidly improving country, conveyed to a market. View the vast region around the lakes, the accumulating population, the extent of navigation and coast, and the magnitude and importance of this improvement cannot fail to strike the mind of every reflecting individual. Nay, it is but a continuance of the navigation of the Ohio for some three or four hundred miles further up a tributary stream. The officers of the Government, under the authority of Congress, have made this survey, have perfected a chart. Why was this done? To collect and embody correct information touching a great and leading avenue of trade; to furnish accurate data, relative to one of the means of transporting arms, ammunition, &c. to be used in defending our country, if another struggle should arise with Great Britain. Now when the service has been performed, when the information has been collected, and the data ascertained, are we to render the whole action nugatory, by closing the shell like the oyster, and withholding the information from those interested. What is it the House is asked to do? To print fifteen hundred extra copies of the report, &c. For whom and for what? For the people. Who is prepared to withhold it, and on what principle? The State which I have the honor in part to represent, has, with her own means, completed a magnicient plan of improvements, which she is rapidly extending to every portion of the State. She asks no aid from this Government to her own works, but correct and accurate information touching any stream flowing through her territory is of importance. Her people are willing to acquire knowledge from any source. As it has been attained, why not furnish it?

Mr. FILLMORE admitted the importance of the work, but not to the extent stated by the gentlemen who had preceded him, especially as to the difference of time in the opening of spring navigation. He was in favor of printing the extra number of copies.

Mr. DROMGOOLE understood the usual number of copies had already been printed. He inquired if this was the fact.

Mr. MERCER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. DROMGOOLE regarded the motion as nothing more than a covert attempt to pledge the House to a revival of the system of internal improvements by the Federal Government; for when the proposition should come up, they would be told that Congress had pledged itself for the work, by ordering the extra number of copies. He hoped, therefore, that the motion to print would not prevail; and believing that something more than the printing was hereafter designed by it, he moved to lay the motion to print on the table.

Mr. THOMAS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MERCER hoped his colleague, after casting the reflections he had, would not persist in a motion which cut off the opportunity to reply.

Mr. DROMGOOLE had cast reflections upon no one, but had referred to what he conscientiously believed would be the effect of the motion, and the design to which it would be used. He could not consent to withdraw his own motion.

Mr. MERCER hoped then, under these circumstances, his colleague's motion would not prevail.

The House refused to lay it on the table—yeas 69, nays 81, and the question again recurring on the motion to print—

Mr. MERCER expressed his astonishment at the remark of his colleague, and disclaimed the existence of any covert design in the motion. Mr. M. then went into some details in reference to the importance of improving the Alleghany river, and adverted to the amount appropriated for works of internal improvement last year, to show there was no need of any secret design to revive that system.

Mr. MARVIN controverted the position that the printing of an extra number of a document would be equivalent to, or have the effect of, pledging the faith of Congress to carry on the work. As to any covert design he denied it, for it was as open as it could be, from the presentation of a large number of petitions, and this motion coming from one of the standing committees of the House. As to "reviving" the system, he did not know that it had been yet abandoned, and this work was of as national a character as any the Government ever engaged in. The whole West was interested in it, for it was but an extension of the Ohio river itself, and such was its importance that he would have preferred a much larger number of copies.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio admitted that he was mistaken in the difference of time, thirty days, between the opening of the canal and the river.

Mr. BIDDLE asked why it was that the people interested in this work should be deprived of an opportunity of examining this report as well as their Representatives? Why should poor Pennsylvania be deprived of the benefit of such a work? In ordering the committee to take charge of it, the House had some object in view.

Mr. BEATTY said the subject had been so well sustained by others, that he should have contented himself with voting in favor of the printing of the report, &c. if it had not been for the observation of one of his colleagues, that those who represented those districts in Pennsylvania most deeply interested in the navigation of the Alleghany, had not been heard from. Mr. B. said the district which he represented had a more immediate interest than that of any other representative on that floor, save that of his colleague, [Mr. PLUMER] who was confined by illness to his room at home, and was unable, from excessive debility, to be in his place. He would observe to the gentleman from Virginia, that that State had an interest of no ordinary magnitude in the navigation of this stream; but as that gentleman resided in Eastern Virginia, his views might not have been directed to that portion of the State west of the Alleghany mountains. The vision of many gentlemen on that floor never reached beyond the barrier of the Alleghany mountains; as the back bone, it obstructed their view, and opposed an insurmountable barrier to the liberal operation of their minds. The tide of emigration, Mr. B. said, had set to that quarter, and the day was not distant when the people west of the mountains would hold such a position in the House as would tend to enlarge the views of gentlemen. He had but one objection to the motion; the number was too small. He desired to increase it; and moved to amend by inserting that three thousand, instead of fifteen hundred, copies be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. RENCHER then asked for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the motion as thus amended, but they were refused, and the motion was agreed to.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. HOPKINS then asked leave to submit the following joint resolution, with a view to refer it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to reissue, to the amount of two millions of dollars, Treasury notes authorized by the act approved 12th of October, 1837, under the restrictions, conditions, and limitations therein prescribed.

Objection being made, Mr. H. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. PECK called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired of the Speaker if the mode by which this resolution was sought to be introduced was in conformity with the rules of the House?

The CHAIR desired the gentleman to point out the discrepancy, if he perceived any.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked if a joint resolution, especially of this character, did not require commitment to a standing committee?

The CHAIR replied that joint resolutions could be introduced on leave, and it was for the House to make such disposition of them as it deemed fit.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 68, nays 107, as follows:

PUBLIC LOAN.

Mr. BELL asked leave to submit a proposition of a similar nature in another shape, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report to the House forthwith, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to raise, by loan or Treasury notes, the sum of two millions of dollars, to supply any demands upon the Treasury to meet which there are no available means on hand.

Some gentleman suggested "three millions," to which Mr. B. assented.

Mr. GRANTLAND suggested "five millions."

Mr. BELL would leave it blank, and the House could fill up the sum; and he further modified the resolution by omitting "or Treasury notes."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he must object to the introduction of this and every other proposition which would retard the action of the House upon the bill they were engaged on yesterday, (the Treasury Note bill.)

Mr. BELL thereupon moved a suspension of the rules; and

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. BELL inquired of the CHAIR whether, if the resolution was received, it would not be open for amendment?

The CHAIR replied, that if the House suspended the rules, the resolution would be open for amendment, modification, rejection, discussion, etc.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 94.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House again resolved itself into committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. INGHAM, in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize a reissue of Treasury notes.

Mr. THOMPSON resumed his remarks, and argued against the constitutionality of issuing Treasury notes, on the ground that Congress possessed no power not expressly given by the Constitution, or not necessarily implied in that instrument, and this was embraced in neither of these provisions. Moreover, Treasury notes were always, and would continue to be below par, and therefore he infinitely preferred the plan proposed by Mr. BELL this morning for a loan, with certificates of stock, though he himself would not propose it, for he was not willing to relieve the Administration of the responsibility of bringing the country to the present crisis in its fiscal concerns. He insisted that the course recommended would be productive of such consequences as would hurry and drive the people to resort to a National Bank, without placing round it those checks and guards he would desire to see such an institution surrounded by. Mr. T. then went at length into the general merits of the currency question and the banking system, and in condemnation of the policy of the Government confining itself to hard money. In allusion to the divorce principle, he dwelt for some time upon the injuries it would inflict upon the South, and went into a variety of details and facts in illustration of this position.

Mr. RHETT deprecated the course of the discussion, and referred to the statements in the President's Message, showing the pressing necessity in the financial condition of the Treasury; and he thought it better to wait for the time when the general subject of finance should come before the House, and, for the present, to confine the discussion to the bill immediately before the committee. He went on to show that the Government was not bankrupt, but had abundant resources, which would, in four or five months, be available, but were not so now, in consequence of the embarrassment occasioned by the explosion of the banks. The want was merely a temporary and present one, which, in a few months, would be supplied by the natural increase of the revenue, and other sources. He replied to the suggestion that the measure was unconstitutional, and referred to the practice of the Government in years past, and during the war, when repeated resort was had to the issue of Treasury notes, to supply the necessities of the Government. He compared the operation to a simple borrowing of money, which, whether with interest or without, was a proper and constitutional transaction, and he contended that it differed in no essential particular from the issuing of stock. Both were promises to pay money at a future day, and both were constitutional. The question in the case of Missouri, under the constitutional prohibition, that no State shall issue bills of credit, was a different one. In that case, the State endeavored to lend money, and to substitute a credit and paper currency for the legal metallic currency of the country. Here it is making a credit, by promises to pay at a future day for services actually rendered. It was, in effect, borrowing money, and paying interest therefor. Authority is given to borrow money, and it made not difference whether it was done in this shape or by the issue of stock. He remarked upon the proposition to sell the stock of the bank, that it could not be done. The bonds were two, one due in one year, and the other in two years, for two millions each, and they could not be sold in time. No merchants would invest their funds for one year to such an amount, and though they might be sent to Europe, and negotiated there, yet before the transaction could be completed, the Government would have suffered all its inconvenience and embarrassment, and would not then need the aid. Mr. R. then went on to answer the remarks of Mr. THOMPSON, in favor of a permanent loan, and replied to the argument, that the measure would injure the interest of the South. He though the different propositions introduced into the House, were designed to create a diversion in another quarter; and he repelled the idea that there was any hostility on the part of the Government towards the banks, or that there was any intention to destroy the banks, as had been intimated. He had never heard such an idea advanced, either in the House or elsewhere. It had been urged that the revenues of the country should be paid in gold and silver; but that did not imply that there should be a destruction of the banks, or an exclusive metallic currency. The true controversy now going on was between the banks and the Government, the capitalists and the people. The banks had been called upon by the Government to fulfil their contracts; they had refused to do it; and, in consequence, had broken. The movements in the House, he thought, indicated a continuance of this war on the part of the banks against the Government; but where, he asked, was the evidence of any war on the part of the Government against the banks? The country had been told, from one end to the other, by Mr. Biddle, that the Government and the banks were in the field, and one or the other must perish; and that remark had been responded to by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] The opposition to the present bill, he supposed, was intended to embarrass the Government, by refusing the supplies. The people had not suffered enough. They were not yet willing to yield to the banks; and the Government must be prostrated, that the cry might be raised of a ruined Administration, and that the crown of the Government had been laid at the feet of the mammoth. Mr. R. referred to a previous attempt to stop the supplies during the last war, and alluded to the reprobation the party, which attempted that ruinous measure, received from the nation. If the House was disposed to try such a measure again, let them do it—let them defeat the bill, and then adjourn and go home. He would be willing, under certain contingencies, to move an early adjournment, and let the people speak respecting the conduct of their Representatives. If gentlemen were determined to stop the wheels of Government, let them do it; but he would bid them beware. It would not be prosperous for the country, but it would be suicidal to them. It would raise a spirit of insubordination in the people, who would resist such action of the representatives, and take the Constitution into their own hands. He said he looked upon the whole war as a war of the banks against the Government. He was in favor of the banks, and a friend to credit; but the question was, whether the whole credit of the country should be monopolized by the banks, and whether they should be allowed to use the credit of the Government to sustain themselves. He said the war had been carried on long enough; and if it should come to the destruction of the Government, there would be one wide-spread ruin, which would sweep away the banks; and he would advise gentlemen, as a friend, to beware of their connection with the banks. He understood the motives of action which governed the opponents of the bill: the more distress the better, for then would come the United State Bank; and this was the first instance in the world, in which a Bank had arrayed itself against the Government; and if the war was continued, the loyal feelings of the people would surely visit this moneyed power of the country with retribution. He made an appeal to the House to aid the Government, and fulfil their duty to the country.

Mr. MENEFEE spoke at length in favor of supporting the law and the Constitution; and contended that this proposition to issue bills of credit was unconstitutional. He said the gentleman [Mr. RHETT] had no right to hold out threats of popular indignation, and contended that there was no desire to refuse supplies to the Government, or to embarrass it; but, on the contrary, from every quarter of the House a disposition was manifested to sustain the Executive in the embarrassments they had brought upon themselves; and to hold the Government up, while they were tottering in the midst of the sufferings of the country. If, however, by Executive domination, it was determined to pass this bill or none—if the representatives were not to be allowed to procure relief in their own way—if a war was to be made by the President upon the House—the indignation of the people, which had been invoked, would fall, not on the representatives, but upon those who attempted to dictate to and control them; and he was willing to abide the issue.

Mr. SOUTHGATE obtained the floor, and said he wished to address the committee, but as it was late, he moved that the committee rise.

The question being taken, was decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 97.

Mr. SOUTHGATE then proceeded in reply to the remarks of Mr. RHETT and Mr. CAMBRELENG, and opposed the bill at length. He contended that the condition of the Treasury was far better than was represented by the advocates of the Treasury notes, if the officers of Government were to disgorge what was in their hands. As a proof of this, he cited the last returns of the Treasury Department, which showed that there were $1,200,000 in the hands of the land receivers, $1,427,000 in the possession of the custom-house officers, and about $4,000,000 in the hands of the other officers of the Government, besides the postmasters, and the whole issue now going on was a contest between the people, on the one hand, and the office holders, on the other. This large amount of money in the keeping of the latter proved it. In further proof of this, Mr. S. went into an examination of the returns of the public defaulters, which, however, he complained were very imperfect. Had these Democratic receivers of public moneys paid into the Treasury the amounts in their pockets there would be no occasion for the issue of Treasury notes, nor would it have been necessary to have withheld from the States the payment of the fourth instalment.

Mr. HOPKINS then presented a substitute for the whole bill, empowering the President of the United States to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum of $10,000,000, at a rate of interest of 6 per cent. payable quarterly, and reimbursable at the will of the Government; to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury, or which may be received therein from other sources, to defray the expenses of the Government, and to be transferrable by stock.

The foregoing was the substance of the first section of Mr. H's amendment. The remainder was of great length, and we believe, substantially, at least, if not identically, the same as the projet of Mr. RIVES in the Senate, being a revival of the State bank system, by twenty-five banks, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved of by the Senate.

Mr. CAMBRELENG questioned the amendment being in order on the bill under consideration, inasmuch as it proposed a system for the regulation of the deposites of the public money, with which the bill had nothing to do. Moreover, that subject had been reported upon, and was then in Committee of the Whole on the Union, on another bill; and by the rule of the House, prohibiting one bill being affixed to or substituted for another, by way of amendment, it must be obvious that this proposition was not in order.

Mr. BELL remarked, that it seemed to be a different proposition in substance from the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. Besides, it was all connected with the Treasury, and all intended to supply revenue. In his opinion it was clearly in order.

Mr. CAMBRELENG admitted that the first section was in order, but he could not assent to the consistency with the rules of the House, of considering an amendment embracing a totally distinct proposition.

Mr. HOPKINS was sure of one thing, that if the amendment was not in order, from covering too broad a ground, neither was the gentleman's speech of yesterday, for that touched on every possible ground having any connection with this subject. But Mr. H. insisted that his proposition was intimately connected with the bill under consideration, for there must necessarily be a very close connection between borrowing money, and keeping it safely after it was borrowed.

Mr. ADAMS insisted that the amendment was in order, inasmuch as it was a proposition to carry out the details of safe-keeping and disbursing the proceeds of the loan, be it of Treasury notes, certificates of stock, or any thing else.

Mr. A. went further into the subject than the point of order, and among other objections to the bill, stated it as his opinion that it did not revive or re-enact all the clauses of the act of October last, and offered no security, therefore, against counterfeiting the notes. He presumed the gentleman from New York, as a lawyer, would see this. He expressed himself willing to give every indulgence to the Government, and to give it what it asked; but he wished the mode of relief to be duly considered, and for that reason he was desirous of considering the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would correct the gentleman from Massachusetts in one particular. Mr. C. never had been, was not then, and probably never should be, a lawyer.

With reference to the point of order, Mr. C. said he would not have pressed it, but the committee must be aware that, if this proposition was decided to be in order, a discussion of one month in that House would be inevitable. If a discussion on the Independent Treasury bill and the deposite bank system be in order as an amendment to this bill to borrow money, he did not know what bill or what proposition might not be considered in order. If it should be ruled to be in order, they would not only have a month's discussion, but they must prepare themselves for a Treasury, without means for the whole of that time. It was only on that account he pressed the question, and he insisted upon it that it was a distinct, a perfectly distinct, proposition.

Mr. HAYNES differed from Mr. HOPKINS that the raising of money was necessarily and properly connected with its safe keeping.

Mr. MERCER insisted upon its being in order, as in Committee of the Whole there should be no restriction.

The CHAIR [Mr. INGHAM] cited the first section of the 43d rule, which is as follows:

"No motion or proposition on a subject, different from that under consideration, shall be admitted under color of amendment."

Now, in view of that rule, the first section of the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, would be in order; but inasmuch as that section formed a substantive part of the whole proposition, and inasmuch as the balance of it was clearly a distinct proposition, having no connection whatever with the subject under consideration, the CHAIR had no hesitation whatever in pronouncing the whole to be out of order.

The Committee acquiesced in the decision without objection.

Mr. RIVES rose and said if no one wished to address the Committee, he would move that they rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. BELL said he would not take an appeal from the CHAIR. He did not offer the amendment to embarrass the House, though he thought the decision of the House erroneous. He did not rise to discuss the merits of the bill; but he thought, considering the character of the bill, the authority by which it had been produced, and the tone and manner by which it had been supported, that it deserved full and deliberate discussion. It deserved deliberate discussion, not only on account of the tone in which it had been urged upon the House; but it was a new fiscal scheme, a plan which he supposed was to be rendered permanent as the system of the country. It had been urged that speedy action should be had upon it, because of the urgent necessity of the Government. But he wanted now accurate information concerning the state of the Treasury. Neither the report of the Secretary, nor of the chairman of Ways and Means, gave any correct information of the state of the revenue. It was impossible to tell the amount of the revenue, whether they were increasing or going backward; and he had never known a more gross, shameful, and deliberate attempt to impose upon the House and the country. In regard to the suppression of information upon financial subjects, he did not think the House had ever been treated with so much contempt. Mr. B. then alleged that the bill was deceptive upon its title and face, and was only adopted to answer its professed purpose, in case no extraordinary appropriations were made by Congress; and did not gentlemen of various sections expect increased appropriations for the army, and for Indian treaties, and Indian wars? He then alluded to funds in the deposite banks, to the trust fund, which he said might have been used, and to moneys in the hands of receivers, about which no accurate information had been given. He alluded to this to show, that a few days' discussion was proper, and that there was no urgent necessity for forcing the bill through the House, though he did not desire a protracted debate.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the gentleman from Tennessee had made some very extraordinary charges, which he would briefly reply to. The gentleman had asserted that the Secretary of the Treasury had deceived the House and the country in the statement furnished by him of the condition of the Treasury, that they were without the necessary information, and that no communication has been sent in by him. Why it was not a fortnight since a response came in from that officer in answer to the gentleman's own inquiry; and it was within a week only that Mr. C. himself had submitted to the House a statement of the condition of the Treasury. In what had the Secretary been deficient? He had stated the whole amount which, according to law, he had the right to draw for. The gentleman asks where is the trust fund? Why, sir, said Mr. C. has it come to this, that the House expects the Secretary of the Treasury to violate the law and the Constitution, by appropriating the trust fund to the public expenses? But, said the gentleman, if it be a trust fund why not invest it? Mr. C. replied, because Congress had given him no law which would empower him to do so. If the gentleman's doctrine were correct the Secretary would have the right, of his own will, to violate every law and every pledge of public faith. If he did as the gentleman seemed to wish him to do, the gentleman himself would be the first to arraign him, and would be wanting in his duty if he did not. Mr. C. insisted that the Secretary had given every particle of information he was required to do, and had included every fund he had a right to draw upon.

Mr. BELL still thought there was a law requiring the investment of the trust fund, but if not, there should be, and the fault was in Congress.

Mr. HALSTEAD moved that the committee rise: lost—88 to 93.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he understood the amendment offered by his colleague had been decided to be out of order, and that the discussion reverted to the original bill. He would offer an amendment confined to the first clause of his colleague's amendment, which, he understood, was decided to be in order, and he assented to the decision that the other clause was not. He objected to this indirect mode of raising money, and thought it would have been better for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to have come forward fairly and candidly, and to have stated that the Government wanted money, and must have it. He was willing they should have it, so far as it depended upon his vote; but not in the way they wanted it. He would assent to a loan; or, if there was no other way to raise money, he would resort to direct taxation, and let the people feel the condition of the country. But he thought there were other means to obtain necessary funds, and he would resort to them in preference to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. R. then offered an amendment, in substance the same as the first clause of the amendment of Mr. HOPKINS, as given above.

Mr. MASON of Virginia, at half past six o'clock, took the floor, and said it must be obvious that they could not get through this bill to-night, and give it that mature deliberation its importance merited, and he therefore moved that the committee rise.

The question was taken by tellers, and lost—63 to 86.

Mr. MASON opposed the original bill, and after proceeding for some time, gave way to

Mr. MENEFEE, who moved that the committee rise: lost—60 to 84.

Mr. MASON again proceeded, and at half past 7, yielded the floor to

Mr. HOPKINS, who renewed the motion for the committee to rise, but they again refused—ayes 79, noes 89.

Mr. MASON again proceeded till 8 o'clock, when he gave way to

Mr. LEGARE, who made an earnest appeal to the committee, and moved that it rise, report, and ask leave to sit again. He remarked that they had been in continuous session for nine hours, and were all more or less considerably fatigued; and as he himself should probably be found in the majority on the bill, he did hope the motion would prevail.

The committee, however, refused to rise, the vote, taken by the tellers, being ayes 80, noes 88.

Mr. MASON resumed, and avowed himself in favor of the special deposite system for the safe-keeping of the public moneys, and notified the House that, in due time, he should submit a projet to that effect. With reference to the measure under debate, he avowed himself willing to go for such a limited issue of Treasury notes as would meet the present exigencies of the Treasury, and when they were exhausted, meet the further wants of the Government by a direct loan. He could not, therefore, vote for the proposition of his colleague [Mr. ROBERTSON] unless it was modified.

Mr. STEWART moved an additional section to the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON, as follows:

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That, in order to meet the present exigencies of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued to an amount not exceeding two millions of dollars, according to the provisions of the act of October last, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland then took the floor, and proceeded for a short time, when he gave way to

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky, who moved that the Committee rise; which was refused, ayes 89, noes 88; the CHAIR voting in the negative, rejects the motion.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS remarking that as it appeared to be a drawn battle, he would renew the motion.

It was then disagreed to—ayes 92, noes 94; taken by tellers.

Mr. JOHNSON took the floor for a moment or two; and some confusion arose on the point of the CHAIR's previous decision.

Mr. ROBERTSON insisted that the CHAIR gave its vote after he had announced the decision in the affirmative; and therefore he had no right to vote.

The CHAIR ruled that the House, having acquiesced, by consenting to vote a second time, it was too late to raise that question.

Mr. JOHNSON then proceeded for some time, when he gave way to

Mr. CHAMBERS, who moved that the Committee rise; upon which motion the tellers reported 90 in the affirmative, and 89 in the negative.

The CHAIR voted in the negative: so the Committee refused to rise.

Mr. YORKE renewed the motion to rise.

The CHAIR decided that no action having been had by the Committee since the last vote, the motion was out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON again resumed his remarks, but soon gave way to

Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, who moved that the Committee rise; and appealed to the oldest members of the House to say if they had ever known any good done in the House on Saturday at midnight.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative: yeas 88, nays 90.

Mr. JOHNSON continued his remarks, and protested against the necessity or expediency of forcing a bill through the House, in the night, against so large a minority—when he yielded the floor to

Mr. CLOWNEY, who renewed the motion to rise. The vote being ascertained, was yeas 88, nays 91; so the motion was lost, and

Mr. JOHNSON again proceeded for a few minutes, and then gave way to

Mr. GRAVES, who renewed the motion to rise, which resulted in the negative: yeas 89, nays 90.

Mr. JOHNSON again resumed and proceeded about a couple of minutes, when

Mr. DUNN asked him to give way for a motion to rise.

Mr. JOHNSON, at first, dissented, unless the gentleman from Indiana would give him an assurance that the motion would prevail.

Mr. DUNN having expressed his belief that it would this time,

Mr. JOHNSON yielded the floor, and

Mr. DUNN renewed the motion, and it was again rejected, the tellers reporting ayes 87, noes 89.

Mr. JOHNSON then said he should not give way to his friends again, but would make a motion himself. He then instantly renewed the motion for the committee to rise and report progress.

Mr. HARPER of Ohio rising to address the House,

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew the motion.

Mr. HARPER remonstrated against the haste with which this important measure was urged on. He disclaimed being opposed to relieve the exigencies of the Government, but wished time to devise the best means of doing so. He then went at some length into the subject of finance and banking generally; and after some time gave way to his colleague,

Mr. COFFIN, who moved that the committee rise.

The tellers reported ayes 86, noes 87.

Mr. BRIGGS, one of the tellers, stated that two gentlemen appeared after the ayes were counted, [Messrs. EWING of Indiana and THOMPSON of South Carolina;] whereupon,

Mr. HOFFMAN moved for a second count, which was ordered, and then the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 91; and

Mr. HARPER proceeded, and occupied the floor till 25 minutes to 12 o'clock; when, without concluding, he gave way to

Mr. HAWES, who renewed his motion for the committee to rise, but yielded it to

Mr. THOMAS, at his request, who remarked that it was better to come to some understanding on the subject; and he would suggest that, for the mutual convenience of all, they adjourn with the determination to take up the subject on Monday, at 12 o'clock, and continue in session till the subject was disposed of. Cries of "no," "no."

Mr. TILLINGHAST then addressed the CHAIR, who inquired if the gentleman from Ohio yielded the floor.

Mr. HARPER said he should not do so for any other purpose than for a motion to rise.

Mr. HAWES then made that motion; and the tellers announcing the division to be ayes 85, noes 87, the committee still refused to adjourn, and

Mr. HARPER continued his remarks for a short time, when he yielded to

Mr. ROBERTSON, who, after a few remarks in support of the expediency of adjourning, made a motion that the committee rise.

The question was then taken at 12 o'clock, and the tellers reported ayes 80, noes 83.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. HARPER again went on for about a minute, when

Mr. CHAMBERS raised the point of order, that it was 12 o'clock at night, and he hoped no one of his friends would vote thereafter, and let it be seen whether an equal number of men could control an equal number.

Mr. DUNCAN would like also to know whether an equal number could control an equal number.

The CHAIR then cited the decision on a similar case, the North Carolina contested election, and under that decision he would not decide the proceedings estopped, but leave it as a question for the judgment of the committee itself. The CHAIR read that case at length, and referred to others embracing the same question.

Mr. CHAMBERS requested the CHAIR to make a positive decision.

The CHAIR accordingly decided according to the previous decision of the House.

Mr. CHAMBERS took an appeal therefrom.

Mr. POPE moved that the committee rise, for the purpose of having the point decided in the House by yeas and nays, with the SPEAKER in the Chair. Though he held that Sunday was not a legislative day, he was desirous of seeing who would so declare by their votes.

The CHAIR said the SPEAKER could not take the Chair unless the committee rise.

Mr. POPE then moved that the committe rise.

Mr. DUNCAN asked if the CHAIR did not understand the motion, and the object of it.

Mr. POPE said the object of his motion was merely to obtain a decision of the House, whether they were willing to transact business upon the Sabbath; and he would be willing then to go into committee again, if the House should decide that it was proper.

The CHAIR said no conditions could be annexed to the motion; if the committee rose, it must rise positively; and the House would have it in their power to adjourn, or to proceed to any other business.

Mr. POPE said he had avowed his purpose, and he had no other object in view.

The vote being taken, the tellers announcing the division to be—ayes 83, nays 82, and the CHAIR voting in the negative, the question was lost.

Mr. REED said he had no doubt the House might, in a case of necessity sit upon the Sabbath; but he would ask if this was such a case of necessity as would warrant the House in doing so.

Mr. CUSHMAN said there could be no appeal from the decision of the committee.

The CHAIR said he had decided that it was in order to set, and he understood there had been an appeal from that decision.

Mr. POPE said he had moved that the committee rise, for the purpose of getting a decision of the House, upon the question of order. The committee had decided that they should rise; and the CHAIR ought not to have arrested that decision. He would put it to the candor of the CHAIR whether he ought to have voted, when the very question to be decided was, whether his own decision was right. He wished it decided whether the House should rush to a decision, upon a matter of so much magnitude, at that hour of the Sabbath. He had always voted for appropriations to sustain the Government, and intended to do so now. It was no use to tell him that it would do no good to discuss the bill; that debate would do no good. It was insulting to the minority. He was willing the Government should have the money, but he preferred getting it in some other way; and he had moved for the committee to rise, for the purpose of having the question decided by yeas and nays, and in all fairness and candor, he did not think the CHAIR ought to have voted; motives of delicacy, at least should have induced him to let the question be taken by the House. He would never vote for legislating on the Sabbath, unless there was some pressing exigency.

Mr. THOMPSON said there was no privilege given to the CHAIR to vote in such a case.

[Many voices said it was not denied.]

Mr. T. inquired if there was any rule authorizing a CHAIRMAN to vote, unless in case of equal division.

Mr. DUNCAN said it was granted, because it was not denied, and the CHAIRMAN had a right to vote as much as any other member.

Mr. POPE said he did not pretend that the CHAIR had not a right to vote, but he contended that he ought to have withheld it from motives of delicacy, upon a rule recognised throughout the civilized world. He now wished the SPEAKER would take the chair, pro tem, to allow the House to vote upon the propriety of continuing the session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said the question would be, shall the decision of the CHAIR stand in the judgment of the House; and as the majority was against the CHAIR, he could not say that his decision was affirmed.

The CHAIR said he had voted, because he supposed he had a right to vote. He had been called upon to vote upon another question; and it was conceded that if he had a right, it was proper to vote. It had been said the motion to rise, was for the purpose of taking a question by the House. No such proposition was made. No such condition could be annexed. If the committee had risen for that purpose, they could not control the action of the House. and it would be competent for the House to do any thing else. It was a simple motion to rise; and he had no other interest, and no other feeling, if he knew his own heart, than belonged to every other member. He thought he had a perfect right to vote.

Mr. POPE said he was not in the habit of indulging in ungenerous remarks; and he would put it to the candor of the CHAIR, whether he not propose to rise for a specific purpose, and he had no other object. If the motion should prevail, he would move to adjourn, for the purpose of testing the sense of the House, and if that motion should be lost, he would move to go back into committee.

Mr. P. then renewed his motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HAYNES requested that the motion might be withdrawn, to allow him to make a single observation.

Mr. POPE said he would withdraw it, if the gentleman, [Mr. HAYNES] would renew it.

Mr. HAYNES said he could not make the pledge, but he only wished to make a single remark.

Mr. POPE then declined to withdraw his motion.

The question was then taken, and the result was the same as before, 83 to 82, and, the CHAIR voting in the negative, the motion was rejected.

The question being on the appeal,

Mr. HAYNES wished to make the observation he had desired to make before, which was this: that the right of a member of that House to vote was not only a personal but a representative right; and it was not only the CHAIRMAN's right to vote, but his duty. Therefore, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from Kentucky, the State of Connecticut, which should have six votes there, would have but five. He remarked that he did not find fault with the gentleman [Mr. POPE] for declining to withdraw his motion

Mr. THOMAS said the question had nothing to do with a question of order. It was merely a question of morals, of propriety, and of patriotism; and he suggested that the question of order was not the proper mode for the gentleman from Kentucky to get at his object. The only way was for the committee to rise, unless they should be found without a quorum, when it was a rule to rise, and report that fact.

Mr. EVERETT would not consent to remain there unless on a most pressing emergency, and notified the House that he should then retire, and not return till 11 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. BRIGGS made an earnest appeal to the better feelings of the members, to adjourn, and allow one, or at most but two days, to further discussion on this bill.

Mr. MORGAN was convinced that no good would, or could, arise from remaining in session after the Sabbath had commenced; and though on any other night he would remain with him who staid last, he felt compelled then to move that the committee rise.

The motion prevailed—ayes 83, noes 76; and the committee then rose and reported.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. YELL and Mr. LEWIS simultaneously called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 85, nays 72; and

So the House adjourned, at quarter past one o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, May 12, 1838.

Mr. LINN presented a letter addressed to his colleague, in support of the petition of Joseph Hoffman, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which the petition had been referred: carried.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the memorial of a number of the inhabitants of Sumpter co. Ala. remonstrating against duelling, and asking Congress to take the necessary measures to amend the Constitution, so as to disqualify from office any persons who shall be engaged in a duel either as principals or seconds: laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Erie co. Pa. asking Congress to hear and decide on the memorial of the Cherokees; and if the allegations in it are found to be true, to rescind the Cherokee treaty: laid on the table.

Messrs. SWIFT, and DAVIS presented similar memorials, from citizens of their respective States, which were also laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the Senate took up the bill to punish the forgery of the Treasury Notes, and other securities of the United States, and the same having been considered, and amended, as in committee of the whole, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Hart and Longstreet was read the third time; and after some rema s from Messrs. Robinson, King, and Preston, it was passed.

Mr. YOUNG presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Illinois, asking a donation of land to, and to aid in the building of, a college: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Edgefield, South Carolina, praying for a new mail route: referred to the Commitlee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, May 14, 1838.

RESCINDING OF THE SPECIE CIRCULAR.

Mr. BOON asked the consent of the House to submit the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, there shall be no discrimination in the kind or description of currency receivable by the Government, for customs, for the sale of the public lands, or for any debt or duty due or owing to the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky raised the question of order against the introduction of this resolution, on the ground that there were already two resolutions of a similar character before the House; one offered by a gentleman from Ohio, and the other by himself, on the 16th ultimo.

The CHAIR said if that was the case, the resolution could not be entertained.

Mr. BOON explained that he had offered this resolution in obedience to what he knew to be the will of his constitu nts, and, further, in compliance with the jo nt resolution of the Legislature of the Sta'e of Indiana.

Mr. BRONSON said, if it was in order, he would move a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of considering this resolution.

The CHAIR ruled it not to be so, but suggested that it would be in order to move a suspension, to take up the other resolution.

Mr. BRONSON doubted if there was a resolution identical with this before the House.

The CHAIR referred to it and showed the object to be the same.

Mr. BOND, who had offered it, expressed his perfect readiness to waive his right and yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIR remarked that the gentleman could only withdraw it on leave of the House.

Mr. BOND accordingly withdrew it, no objection being made.

Mr. BRONSON then moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. TURNEY rose to object to the withdrawal of Mr. BOND's resolution, but the CHAIR decided it to be too late.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the gentleman from Indiana would not press this question now.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend, which were ordered, and were—yeas 95, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Everett, Evans, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Foster, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hopkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kilgore, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson Mason, Martin, Maury, McKennan, Menefee, Morgan, Mathias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Peck, Potts, Pratt, Rariden, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Stewart, Stone, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yell—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Beatty, Bicknell, Birdsall, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Farrington, Fry, Glascock, Hammond, Haynes, Holt, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, George M. Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, James M. Mason, Robert McClellan, McClure, Moore, Murray, Noble, Parker, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Potter, Reily, Rives, Robertson, Sheffer, Spencer, Taylor, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vanderveer, Wagener, and Jared W. Williams—53.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Resolutions being in order—

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked the House to proceed with the public business.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky objected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, in order to test the sense of the House, moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 132, nays 50.

So the rules were suspended.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. INGHAM in the Chair, on the "bill to carry into effect an act approved on the 12th day of October, 1837, to authorise the issuing of Treasury Notes."

The question was on the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON, of Virginia, proposing to substitute for the whole bill a measure empowering the President of the United States to borrow on the credit of the United States, a sum of $10,000,000, at 6 per cent. interest, and reimbursable at the will of the Government.

The pending question was the amendment o

Mr. STEWART to authorise the issue of Treasury Notes to meet the immediate exigencies of the Government.

Mr. HARPER concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HAWES then followed, and continued his observations for a few minutes, when, on account of severe indisposition, he fainted. Upon his recovery, he yielded the floor; and

Mr. DUNN proceeded to oppose the bill, and went at length into an examination of the messages of the President and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, for some time past, upon the subject of the currency, with a view to point out inconsistencies, and to prove that it had been intended from the first to establish a Government bank and a Government currency, and that this bill was intended, in part, to carry out that scheme.

Mr. STEWART then inquired if there was a quorum.

The CHAIR replied it was manifest there was not a quorum.

Mr. GOODE took the floor, and was going on with some remarks in opposition to the bill, when he was interrupted by Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, who rose to a point of order, and inquired if there was a quorum present. He moved a call of the House, for he wished to get out of that place before night.

Mr. GOODE begged the gentleman to withdraw his motion, and allow him to proceed. He would not detain the House long; and feeling compelled to make some observations, he would rather do it then, than at such an hour as that at which the House adjourned on Sunday morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS consented to withdraw his motion, again repeating, that he wanted to go home before midnight.

Mr. GOODE then went at some length into an examination of the messages of the President at the special and the present sessions, and into a history of the various propositions of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to to show that the pretences that something was necessary to be done to relieve the wants of the Treasury, all ended in the prosecution of a plan to establish a Sub-Treasury or Government bank. He was willing to afford the Government all the money that was necessary to carry on its operations, and he would at any time vote for supplies, but he was opposed to the Sub-Treasury and to the issuing of Treasury notes.

Mr. SERGEANT then took the floor, and, after complaining of the short notice previous to the introduction of this bill, and of the attempt to hurry it through the House, he spoke of errors in the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, which rendered them unworthy of confidence as the foundation of financial action; and then went at length into the discussion of various topics connected with the bill, chiefly in reply to the remarks of Mr. CAMBRELENG.

At five o'clock, Mr. SERGEANT gave way to

Mr. RUSSELL, who moved that the Committee rise.

The question being taken, resulted in the negative—yeas 79, nays 85.

Mr. SERGEANT then resumed his remarks, and objected to the bill, that it empowered the Government to make paper money; whatever name it might be called by, whether a loan or not, it in fact authorized the creation of money, which the public creditor would be compelled to take; and he compared it with the old continental money, which he thought the best of the two. This paper money, he contended, would pass as a currency, and from the first had been intended so to pass, and it would be injurious, by causing confusion in the currency, and that at the very time, when it was said that there was a redundancy of paper money; and it would tend in the present state of disorder in the currency to prevent its returning to order. It was liable to another objection; it was delusive and seductive, and would prevent a due regard to economy, and would lead to extravagant expenditures, and not only that, but it would be constantly fluctuating like any other paper money. He preferred a restoration of the currency of the country to a sound basis, and would supply the Government by making a loan from abroad.

Mr. S. having concluded—

Mr. TILLINGHAST, at half past 5 o'clock, moved that the committee rise; which was disagreed to—ayes 90, noes 94.

Mr. TILLINGHAST spoke for some time, and then gave way a few minutes after 6 o'clock to

Mr. CRANSTON, who moved that the committee rise: lost—ayes 87, noes 93.

Mr. TILLINGHAST proceeded till near 7 o'clock, when he gave way; and

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the committee rise, and proposed that the bill should be taken out of committe to-morrow, and that the final question should be taken on the day following, provided the previous question should not be called before four o'clock.

He made this proposition in a spirit of compromise, that the House need not be wearied with a night session, and that a reasonable time might be allowed for the discussion of so important a measure.

The question was taken, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 86.

Mr. EVANS moved an adjournment.

Mr. BRONSON called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, 29 in the affirmative, and 128 in the negative.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, May 14, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Bradford county, Pennsylvania, on the subject of letter postage: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, seven memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania against the treaty of New Echota: laid on the table.

Mr. SWIFT presented the petition of Amos Northrop, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRENTISS presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Vermont, remonstrating against the Cherokee treaty: laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Stoneham, Massachusetts, on the same subject: also laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL presented a petition from Solomon Class, a mail contractor, praying for an increase of compensation for carrying the mail between Pontiac and Saganaw, in the State of Michigan, and a similar petition from Benjamin F. Fox, another mail contractor, praying for an increase of compensation for carrying the mail between Detroit and Howell in the same State. Mr. N. said, that in both of these cases, the contract was to carry the mail on horseback; but the mails on both routes soon became too large to be transported in that mode, and had to be carried in wagons. They were both strong cases, calling for an increase of compensation, or for a release of the contractors from their present ruinous contracts. He would take the occasion to add, that he considered it unfortunate that the new law concerning the Post Office establishment, had divested the Postmaster General of all discretionary authority upon this subject. To the new States, at least, in which the weight of the mails generally increased so rapidly, it was important that he should have retained that authority. The petitions were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLIAMS, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for running the northeastern boundary line of the United States; and after some remarks from Mr. WILLIAMS, it was, by general consent, read twice and referred.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the Senate took up the joint resolution for the relief of Vespasian Ellis; and the same having been considered as in Committee of the Whole, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia was taken up as the unfinished business; the question being on Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment, requiring the banks to keep on hand an amount of coin equal to one-quarter of that of their private deposites, excluding special deposites, in addition to coin equal to one-quarter the amount of their circulation, as in the bill—

Mr. WEBSTER spoke for some time against the amendment; after which,

Mr. BENTON addressed the Senate in favor of the principle contained in it, and concluded by moving to amend it by striking out the word "private;" which motion was lost—ayes 13, noes 15.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama spoke in favor of the amendment; and after some remarks from Mr. BUCHANAN in further explanation of it, the debate was continued by Messrs HUBBARD and BUCHANAN in favor of the amendment, and by Mr. RIVES in opposition to it; but before taking any question,

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, May 15, 1838.

The SPEAKER, on leave, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing a list of the names of all pension agents, the amounts paid by them, etc.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, laid on the table.

Reports from committees were then called for.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of J. G. Lyon and others of the city of Mobile; which was laid on the table.

Mr. W. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Roger Leonardy, praying indemnity for losses of cattle during the Seminole war; which was laid on the table.

Mr. W. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, praying remuneration for losses sustained in consequence of the war with the Creek Indians; which was laid on the table.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Amos C. Wright, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Amos C. Wright, and that the same, with accompanying documents, be referred to the Third Auditor for settlement, under the existing laws.

Mr. W. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Rebecca Conly, which was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. CASEY, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Captain E. Shaler and others, praying for a grant of land for extraordinary services during the war; and the same was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Elisha Smith, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Mussey and Thomas James.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported with an amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant William Russwurm, deceased.

Mr. SHEPPERD, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of —— Nick, alias Reginald Hillay.

Mr. BIRDSALL, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Peter Vroman, of New York, (praying the redemption, by the Government of the United States, of $1,400 continental money) and that it lie on the table: agreed to.

Mr. MAY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported Senate bill supplementary to the act providing for the adjustment of titles to land in the town of Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes, and moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. CRARY appealed to the gentleman not to press that motion, but permit the bill to take the usual course.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio also joined in the request; and

Mr. MAY accordingly moved the commitment of the bill; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of M. P. Le Duc; and the petitioner had leave to withdraw the same.

Mr. DEBERRY, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the petition of the inhabitants of Somerset county, Maine, praying the refunding of certain duties on imported hay, reported unfavorably on the same; which was laid n the table.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the investment of moneys received or appropriated for the use of Indians or Indian tribes.

Mr. SOUTHGATE, from the Committee on the Militia, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That 10,000 extra copies of the report and bill reported by the Committee on the Militia be printed for the use of the House.

The resolution, under the rule, would lie over one day, but Mr. S. moved its adoption.

Mr. YELL objected to its consideration at this time.

Mr. SOUTHGATE, therefore, moved a suspension of the rule, but the House refused; 82 to 47—not two-thirds.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Va. from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Frances Jones, widow of John Jones, of the State of Virginia.

RECISION OF TREASURY CIRCULAR.

Mr. BOON then rose and said that, however he might regret the temporary interruption to other business, he felt constrained again to ask the leave of the House to introduce the resolution submitted by him yesterday. [See last evening's Globe.]

The CHAIR stated that, on examining the calandar, he found thereon a resolution on the same subject, and he suggested to the gentleman that he had better move to take that one up.

Mr. BOON accordingly moved to take the resolution submitted by Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, on the 16th of April; which was in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill making it unlawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of this Government, to continue in force or make any general or special order making a distinction or discrimination in the medium or kind of currency in which the different branches of the revenue (either from the sales of the public lands, or from any other source) of the United States shall be collected.

Mr. BOON and Mr. BRONSON suggested that the resolution was a distinct proposition from that submitted yesterday, which was a joint one. The former remarking that one specified the kind of money to be received, which the other did not.

The CHAIR ruled otherwise, on the ground that the subject it referred to was the same.

Objection being made to take up the resolution—

Mr. BOON moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. CASEY moved a call of the House, which was refused.

The House also refused to suspend the rules—yeas 94, nays 76, not two-thirds, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Whittlesey, and Jared W. Williams—76

Mr. BOON then gave notice that he should renew this proposition every day until the House acted upon it.

TREASURY NOTES.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, again went into Committee on the Union, Mr. INGHAM in the Chair, on the bill to carry into effect the act of the 13th of October last, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

The question was on the substitute of Mr. ROBERTSON to authorize the raising of a loan of ten millions of dollars, at six per cent. with the amendment of Mr. STUART to authorize an issue of Treasury notes to the amount of two millions of dollars, to provide for the immediate exigencies of the Government.

Mr. TILLINGHAST concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill, but avowed himself willing to vote for a loan.

Mr. BIDDLE obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. CUSHMAN, who made a very interesting statement in response to the oft-repeated charge in relation to the Branch Bank of the United States at Portsmouth, and in explanation of the whole occurrence, and the part taken therein by himself, Governor Hill, Secretary Woodbury, and others.

Mr. BIDDLE then proceeded to oppose the bill at length; and first, to review the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, (in relation to paying members of Congress in specie,) made in response to a resolution of Mr. B. at the late called session. Mr. B. then replied to Mr. RHETT, and went into an examination of the principles of finance and banking, as connected with the circulation and use of specie, and in relation to the action of the Government thereon.

Mr. BELL then took the floor, and went at length into various arguments in opposition to the bill, and spoke of the different statements of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, and of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as wholly deceptive; as also, he contended, were the bill and its title deceptive, and wilfully intended to impose upon the community. The statements of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that there were funds in hand to redeem the Treasury notes, and that a permanent loan was unnecessary, he contended were not correct, and went into statements to show that the income would not be as great as was anticipated, and that the funds alluded to would not be available.

Mr. B. contended that the revenue had been reduced within a few years, by the action of the country, from forty-eight millions to ten, or twelve, or at most to fifteen millions; and said that he considered the state of the country prosperous, though it had been called bloated, when the revenue was so large, and had enabled the country to pay off the public debt, and place twenty-eight millions of surplus in the hands of the States. He said the scheme of issuing Treasury notes now, was only an experiment upon the people, to see how far such issues might be carried, and was an attempt to establish, in effect, a Treasury bank, by whatever name it might be called. He alleged that the Government was the cause of the expansion of bank paper, and read from speeches and from "the official organ" to prove that encouragements had been held out to States to charter new banks; and especially, that Pennsylvania was encouraged to charter a large institution, by the hope held out, that it would become the central depositary of the public moneys; and he considered this the worst instance of bribery and corruption ever held out by any Government, or individual, to be found in the history of bribery. He went into an argument, founded on the condition of finances in the South-western States, to show the excessive issues had been induced by the action of the Government, in relation to the affairs of banks, and the sale of the public lands. The most extraordinary facilities had been held out to the banks to induce them to expand, and Indian lands, almost to the destruction of the Chickasaw nation, had been brought into the market to encourage speculation; and when every thing was at the highest state of trade and speculation, in consequence of this action, it was suddenly arrested. Banks were denounced, speculation was condemned, the Specie Circular was issued, and the weight of the injury fell upon the proscribed States of Mississippi and Alabama. He also alluded to various expenditures, and argued that the Government had not been governed, notwithstanding their professions, by any system of practical economy. The expenditures, he said, had been extravagant, and in many cases useless.

Mr. B. then spoke of internal improvements, and said the Cumberland Road bill had been presented as a test question, and he had been particularly pointed at in the debate on that bill. He had never, during the eleven years that he had been in Congress, voted for any appropriation for internal improvement—not even for the improvement of a river that run by his own door, or for the construction of a road that run through the place of his residence; and he said that the very party now in power, which had condemned the doctrine of internal improvements, had increased the expenditure from a quarter of a million to over two millions; and that now, notwithstanding the recommendation to reduce the appropriations as low as possible, on account of the state of the Treasury and currency, the President had recommended appropriations for internal improvements to the amount of nineteen hundred thousand dollars. He then went into a review of the division of the parties as respected breaches of privilege, to show that these test votes were generally delusive and deceptive; and that with the changes of the times the sentiments and votes of members would change also. He adverted to the graduation and preemption schemes, as recommended by the President, which was designed as a test in the new States; and, after dwelling on these and other topics for some time, he concluded by expressing his solemn conviction that the bill under consideration was but the initiatory step of a general system that was in anticipation by the present Administration—the establishment of a Government bank, and the issue and circulation of Government paper.

Mr. RANDOLPH followed on the same side, and went into a review of the causes of our present embarrassments, and those in England, and by a contrast between the bank paper circulation in both countries went on to contend that ours did not arise altogether from excess of issue, or from any of the causes assigned by the President in his message at the special session. Mr. R. ascribed them to a different source, viz: to the enormous body of office seekers who left their homes to seek employment under General Jackson, after his first election. This unhinged the whole pre-existing state of things, and, the President being regarded as the only fountain of honor and profit, uprooted the antecedent principles of our Government. This position Mr. R. illustrated and sustained at length, and had not concluded when our columns were closed.

[The Treasury Note bill was brought into the House between seven and eight o'clock, the several amendments being informally acted upon for the purpose of being offered in the House, when a more full and detailed account of them will be given. The House then adjourned, without transacting any further business.]

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, May 15, 1838.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and the General Post Office, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 29th of December last, requiring information with regard to the salaries of the various clerks employed in said Departments; and,

On motion of Mr. WHITE, it was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE CHEROKEE TREATY.

Mr. DAVIS presented several memorials in relation to the Cherokee treaty, praying for its revision and repeal: laid on the table.

Mr. McKEAN presented several memorials on the same subject; which were disposed of in the same manner.

Mr. LUMPKIN arose, and addressed the Senate to the following effect:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I hold in my hand a letter addressed to me by Mr. John Ridge, a Cherokee man, of the country West. This letter contains much interesting and detailed information in regard to the present state and condition of the Cherokee people, and affords a fair view of the prospects which await these people, if they could be permitted to enter into the possession of the advantages secured to them by the treaty of 1835. It is my wish, sir, to read this letter for the information of the Senate and of the country. I will add, that I have numerous letters from highly respectable Cherokees who have settled in the West, which go to sustain fully all the views and statements of Mr. Ridge. The propriety of introducing and reading this letter I trust will not be controverted, when we take into consideration the present actual state of our Cherokee affairs.

It is known that the Government, in December, 1835, entered into an arrangement or treaty with a numerous and intelligent delegation of the Cherokee people. Under which arrangement it was stipulated and agreed that the whole people should emigrate from the East to the West, under the care and superintendence of the Government of the United States, on or before the 23d of the present month, May, 1838; and several thousand of them, including the most intelligent, have already emigrated, and taken up their abodes in their new country, where they are quiet, happy, and contented, and are anxious to see the balance of their tribe join them in the West, and participate in their rich inheritance. Among the emigrants are Mr. Ridge, the writer of the letter to which I have referred, who is a man of strong native mind, improved by cultivation and education. He is a man of great integrity of character, whose lofty spirit became restless under the conflicts and controversies of his people with the State Governments, which terminated in the annihilation of the Cherokee Government. Under these circumstances Mr. Ridge and his friends yielded to the force of circumstances, choosing to abandon their country rather than be deprived of their native right to self government; and Mr. Ridge became the independent advocate of emigration, as the best hope of securing to his people the boon of liberty and independence. And now, with a prudent and intelligent forecast, he looks to a more honorable and endeared relation to the Government of the United States, as the only rational hope of perpetuating the existence of the native American race.

But, sir, by the indulgence of the Senate I will read the letter of Mr. Ridge referred to, and to sustain the truth of which I have in my possession ample testimony.

[Leave being granted, Mr. L. read as follows:]

SOUTH LEE, BERKSHIRE Co. MASS.
May 7, 1838.

MY FRIEND: While I was in New York, I received your kind letter of the 25th ult. in answer to mine, for which I am greatly indebted to you. It was my desire to have visited Washington, in order to have the pleasure of a personal interview with you, and also to see the result of the great Indian bill, now in a course of discussion in the Senate, but the period I have set apart to return to my country is the first of June, and I have but a short time to spend among my wife's relations.

I did not write as fully as the interesting subject of the Cherokee removal, and the nature of the country, demanded, as I then believed I should see you. Now you will allow me to relate my opinion of our country in the West, and the situation of our people.

The treaty is so liberal in its provisions for the comfortable removal of the Cherokees, that I have heard no complaints on that head, but the highest satisfaction. Those who went by water in steamboats in the spring of the year, passed with so much despatch, that most of them planted corn, and raised considerable crops. You know that good and exemplary christian, Mr. Charles Moore. He said that he planted in the month of June, and raised a greater crop of beans, pumpkins, and corn, than he ever did in Georgia under the most favorable circumstances. He said that "the land in the West was so rich, that he could compare it to nothing else than a fattened hog, which was so fat that he could not get up." I have travelled extensively in that country—once, from my residence, near the corner of Missouri and Arkansas, to Fort Smith, through Flint district, where I had the pleasure of beholding fine springs of water, excellent farms, and comfortable houses, and mills and mission schools, belonging to the Cherokees, and every evidence of prosperity and happiness was to be seen among the Cherokees as a people. I saw a number who had previously arrived, and who arrived since I had, and I heard but one sentiment—that they were happy and contented in their new country. Indeed, the soil is so exceedingly rich, and well timbered, and the navigation of the Arkansas river affords them superior commercial advantages to what they enjoyed in the East. I joked with the people, and asked them if they would return to Georgia, even if they could be re-established in their ancient rights and location in that country? They invariably said, No, by no means! Nothing would induce them to return. But they sincerely wished that the eyes of their countrymen might be opened, and break from the delusions of John Ross and his political tools, and escape to this good land. I think in this direction, I travelled over eighty-eight miles of the nation in a straight line. After this, I visited the newly acquired land, called neutral, which was added to our country west, by the treaty of New Echota. I rode over it about two days, and I their found Mr. Joseph Rogers, our Cherokee friend from the Chatahoochy, pleasantly situated in the finest region of country I ever beheld on any land in the United States. The streams here, of all sizes from the river to the brooks, run swiftly over clear stones and pebbles, and the water is clear as crystal, in which excellent fish abound in vast numbers. The soil is diversified, from the best prairie lands to the best bottom lands in vast tracts. Never did I see a better location for settlements, and better springs in the world. God has thrown his favors here with a broad cast. In this region are numerous mills, and it is of itself capable of supportinga larger population than the whole Cherokee nation. On my return, I travelled towards Fort Gibson, seventy-five miles, in another direction, and I found the richness of the soil, and natural advantages, far superior to any other country in my travels. In this trip, I visited Parkhill mission, where the Rev. Mr. Worcester and Mr. Boudinot are located, and are engaged in the translation and publication of useful religious books in the Cherokee language, and also Choctaw books prepared by the Choctaw missionaries. But what pleased me more, and which was a new thing here, in this country, those gentlemen had published a christian almanac, in Cherokee and English, calculated for the meridian of Fort Gibson! I found this extensively in circulation among the Cherokees; and in fact, I was pleased to find, that religious tracts in the Indian language, on the shelves of full-blooded Cherokees, and every one knew and seemed to love, the "messenger," as they call Mr. Worcester. I very often met with new emigrants from the eastern nation, either arriving, or settling the country, or on their way to Fort Gibson, to draw the balance of their dues for their lands and improvements. These new comers were formerly of opposite parties in the old nation; there was no disposition to quarrel, but every disposition manifested to cultivate friendship, and rejoice together in the possession of this country.

I had the pleasure of being introduced to General Arbuckle, commanding at Fort Gibson, and I found him to be an excellent man, of fine personal appearance, and intelligence. He informed me that the country next to the Osages, on the Verdigris, was the best in the country, and was yet unsettled; so you perceive that I am greatly pleased with our new country. Most all the intelligent men of our nation, our supreme judges, our sheriffs, our marshals, our legislators, and our national treasurer, are, you are aware, already removed; and all are engaged in the building of houses and the opening of farms. Many of the Cherokees htave turned their attention to merchandising, and some have supplied themselves with goods from New Orleans and New York, besides other places more convenient to the nation.

Many of the Christian Cherokees are engaged in the organization of schools and temperance societies; and there is no danger, as some supposed, that the Cherokees would indulge so much in the chase as to retrograde from civilization. And I have also the pleasure of informing you, that the utmost friendship and tranquillity prevails between the Indians and the citizens of the United States, not only those who live at the military stations, but those of your citizens who reside in Missouri and Arkansas, near the Cherokee nation. In the best state of friendship they visit and trade together on both sides of the line, to their mutual advantage. In addition to this, we have excellent saline springs, where salt is made by the Cherokees. I was told Judge Martin was about to commence to work at one of these salines. In regard to the health of the country, I find that it is good on the small water courses, and it is only on the larger water courses that the fever and ague prevails among new settlers. But it is somewhat singular, that whenever a Cherokee arrives in the country, wherever that might be, he cannot be induced to change his location for a better. He will say that there is either no better, or that his place is as good as he wants it to be.

If the people of the United States could only see our condition in the West, they would no longer assist John Ross to delude the poor, ignorant portion of our people to remain in the East, while he can speculate on their miseries.

The Cherokee Government in the West is very much like it was in the old nation before it was suppressed by the States.

They have an Executive, Legislature, and a Judiciary, and trial by jury.

I feel happy to ascertain that a majority of the Senate entertain such magnanimous views towards the well-being of the Indians in future. Removed as they are from State jurisdiction and conflict, with the rich advantages of christianity and civilization, the Choctaws, Cherokees, Chickasaws, Creeks, and other nations, are destined to become a mighty and a happy people in the West. I am truly pleased to find that our neighbor Senator Sevier stands by your side in this great undertaking. That was a happy thought of his, in calling the Indian Territory "Neosho." It means, in the Osage language, the "Clear Waters."

I should be glad to receive the documents connected with that bill, and all the important speeches upon the subject.

While I was in New York, I found that the religious community were entirely bewildered by John Ross, and the party slang of their papers. Instead of viewing the late treaty as a blessing to the Cherokees, and as a mode of relief to the suffering Cherokees, they considered it the source of all their afflictions. I attempted to explain John Ross's position in the papers; and many of them are convinced that the treaty and its friends are in the right; but a great many are still bewildered. They believe that John Ross is the nation; and could he succeed to break the treaty, the whole of the Southern States would retire from their jurisdictional charters.

I sometimes feel afraid that all is not right in these editors of newspapers. It would seem that they would be willing to have the Indians resist and shed blood, and produce a Florida scene, in order to render their Government odious. They seem to be pleased to have money expended to suppress Indian hostilities, and then blame the Government for the expenses. They well know that the Indians cannot exist in the States; and all they can possibly accomplish by their memorials, is to assist John Ross to effect a treaty, the character of which is buried deep in his breast. They all know that in the East the Cherokees have no Government, and have had no elections for nine years past; and yet John Ross is, in their estimation, a constitutional chief over all the Cherokees; and if the President refuses to recognise this preposterous claim, and determines to see that all the Cherokees shall share alike from the avails of their land, then they proclaim him a monster, and John Ross the Cherokee christian.

I shall remain here to the first of June; and I will be obliged to you for another letter before I start for the West. I am your friend.

JOHN RIDGE.

Gov. WILSON LUMPKIN.

Thus, sir, you have the views of a man, than whom none is better qualified to judge, or more entitled to full credit. Now, sir, what a contrast does this letter of facts present, when compared with the idle, silly, and false sympathy set forth in the memorials and petitions with which we are daily inundated—coming from a distant people, who are obviously ignorant of the merits of the subject with which they are impertinently intermeddling. Yes, sir, these memorialists are made to complain upon a subject upon which, from the nature of things, they care and know but little. Sir, these good, religious memorialists are brought in as auxiliaries to a political cause. The obvious object is to bring odium and censure on the administration of your Government. I aspire not to the honor of those who are the organs of such petitioners. Sir, I am the friend of liberty and individual rights. To petition, speak, write, and publish, is guarantied to the American citizen by the Constitution of our country. I would abridge none of these rights. But I am the avowed opponent of the impertinent intermeddling of one section of our country with the local concerns of another section. And, sir, when in my closet, I sometimes tremble for the ultimate destiny of my country, when I trace the progress and movements of the present times.

We are justly and properly considered a christian people. The Constitutions of our country all recognise the Bible as a book of Divine origin and revelation, and none can have a higher regard and veneration for that standard of religion than myself. But in the formation of our Constitution, great care was taken not to blend Church and State; a religious party in politics, such as these petitioners on the Cherokee subject, was never contemplated by the framers of our Constitution. But with all our guarranties of liberty of conscience, what is the present state of facts? Look at the journals and proceedings of both Houses of Congress during the present session. All other business dwindles into mere items, when compared with the mass of matter, forced on the attention of Congress by a concert of professed christian spirits, who are countenanced, encouraged, and sustained by highly talented men of the political party, who are opposed to the present Administration of the Federal Government. And these pious people take the liberty, upon all occasions, of dealing out denunciation and condemnation upon the Government of their country. And yet, when conclusive testimony is introduced to expose their error, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] complains of the want of respect to these petitioners. The letter of Mr. Ridge read by me, has nothing in it unkind or uncourteous to these people, unless the exposure of their errors and ignorance upon this Indian subject may be so considered. Compare the severity and sentiments of these memorials, levelled against the Government to help out a political party, with this letter; and I may safely appeal to any tribunal for an award in favor of Mr. Ridge, upon the score of moderation, when compared with this christian party in politics. Mr. Ridge's letter certainly gives him much the strongest claim to a christian spirit of moderation and truth.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts undertakes to justify his complaining constituents and memorialists upon the ground that their complaints are confined to the validity of the late treaty. Moreover, the Senator informs us that he has never considered the treaty a valid one; that it was made with a small number of unauthorized individuals of the Cherokee people, and that fifteen or sixteen thousand Cherokees have remonstrated against the treaty during the present session of Congress. Upon this subject I will give the Senator and the Senate correct information. I wish the whole truth to be known to the country. The numerical majority of the whole Cherokee people has for many years been under the influence of Mr. Ross and his party; and, therefore, I have no doubt but a majority of the whole Cherokee people, if they had been consulted, would have joined Ross in dissenting to the treaty. But it is equally true that a majority of the Cherokees who possessed a sufficient share of intelligence to comprehend the subject, were decidedly in favor of the treaty; and are now happy and satisfied in the enjoyment of the benefits and advantages secured to them and their people under the provisions of the treaty.

My opinion of Indian treaties is known to the Senate. But I would ask, when was the validity of an Indian treaty, before this, tested by being submitted to the whole mass of an Indian people, men, women, and children? A new test has been introduced to try the validity of this treaty: it is to be tested upon the broadest principles of Democracy. It ought to be sufficient to satisfy the wise and the good, every where, that this treaty was negotiated, on behalf of the Cherokees, by the most intelligent and patriotic men that ever negotiated an Indian treaty, and that it secures to the whole people more signal advantages than were ever before secured to an Indian people, by any treaty heretofore entered into by this Government. This treaty dispenses equal justice to the rich and poor, without favor or partiality to a solitary individual.

One word, sir, upon the subject of the remonstrance of the fifteen thousand Cherokees, against the execution of the treaty. Including every Indian soul, now in the Cherokee country East, their number cannot amount to fifteen thousand—the whole of the men, women, and children, including the infants at the breast, and they do not amount to that number. Here then, Mr. President, we have a forcible illustration of the imposition practised upon honorable Senators, who become the organs of the fashionable petitioners of the present day. Sir, the facts which I state are susceptible of proof, before any tribunal whatever. I, therefore, hope we shall hear no more about the fifteen thousand Cherokee complainants.

But, sir, I could bear with patience and composure all this delusion and ignorance, and impertinent intermedling, but for the apprehended mischief and evil which the opponents of the Government are likely to bring upon the poor Cherokees themselves, and for whom they profess to feel such strong sympathy. The opponents of the Government, and their pious friends, will not let the Indians go. Every expedient has been resorted to for the purpose of preventing these people from entering into their goodly inheritance. I fear nothing will satisfy the tender mercies of those who are intermedling with this subject, but another Indian war. It requires an extraordinary share of philosophy to exercise composure under such provocations as are directly addressed to the Southern people from day to day in this chamber, under the humble garb of petition. But, sir, I will not indulge in further remarks on this subject at present; for I cannot do so without feelings which I do not wish to cherish.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Agnes Dudley; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill imposing a duty on imported starch; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the bill to establish and regulate the navy ration, reported the same with amendments.

Mr. BROWN presented the proceedings of a large number of citizens of North Carolina, and a memorial from the same, praying for an appropriation for the purpose of improving the navigation of —— Sound: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill to punish counterfeiting Treasury notes and other securities of the United States, and the joint resolution for the relief of Vespasian P. Ellis, were severally read the third time and passed.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration, but this requiring the unanimous consent of the Senate, and Mr. TALLMADGE objecting, it lies over one day.

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia procure and report to the Senate statements of the condition of the several banks in the District of Columbia that have applied for an extension of their charters, in regard to the following particulars:

1. The names of the officers and directors of the banks, the amount of stock owned by each, and the debts due from each to the banks respectively, discriminating between the executive, legislative, and judicial officers of the Government among them, and also between residents and non-residents.

2. The stockholders of the banks respectively, the amount of stock owned by each, and of debts due from each, discriminating as above.

3. The debtors to the banks respectively, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

4. The number of suits that the banks respectively have instituted against their debtors since the suspension of specie payments, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN, and explained in yesterday's report.

Messrs. NILES and BENTON, severally addressed the Senate in favor of the principle contained in the amendment; after which,

Mr. ALLEN moved to lay the bill on the table, to give time to obtain the information called for by the resolution submitted by him this morning, and in consideration of the absence and indisposition of the Senator who submitted the pending amendment.

This motion was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, and Williams—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—23.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, May 16, 1838.

RECISSION OF TREASURY CIRCULAR.

Mr. BOON rose and said, pursuant to the notice he had given yesterday, he moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of taking up the resolution of Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky for one hour, adding that he understood that gentleman would modify it, if it should be received, by adopting that of Mr. B.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill making it unlawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of this Government, to continue in force or make any general or special order making a distinction or discrimination in the medium or kind of currency in which the different branches of the revenue (either from the sales of the public lands or from any other source) of the United States shall be collected.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that having been informed some gentlemen voted against the suspension of the rules yesterday, because they disapproved of the phraseology of this resolution, he gave notice that if the House assented to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, he would so modify his resolution as to make it a joint one, without any reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GRENNELL asked for the yeas and nays, but, on dividing the House, no quorum appearing,

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and, after proceeding for some time,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Va. moved to dispense with it; the House then refused, but, after proceeding further, the motion was renewed by Mr. MARVIN, and prevailed.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative—yeas 111, nays 70.

A joint resolution from the Senate, for the relief of Vespasian Ellis, was taken up, read twice, and, on motion of Mr. WISE, ordered to its third reading, and then read a third time and passed.

The Senate bill to authorize the sale of certain bonds [of the Bank of the United States] belonging to the United States, was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Senate bill for the relief of Hard and Longstreet was read twice, and, on motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The Senate bill to amend the act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes, was also read twice, and, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CARTER of Tennessee and Mr. HARLAN of Kentucky, severally had leave to withdraw some papers relating to private claims.

Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. SOUTHGATE appealed to the House to take up the motion to print 10,000 extra copies of the militia report; but it was objected to.

TREASURY NOTES.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the rules were suspended, and the House took up the "bill to carry into effect an act approved the 12th of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," reported last evening, from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill, as reported, was in the following words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be, issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the Treasury and cancelled.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the bill, by inserting between the 5th and 6th lines, after the word "provisions," " and subject to all the conditions, limitations, and restrictions;" which was agreed to.

Mr. C. moved to add the penal clause of the former bill against counterfeiting, etc; but, after some conversation with Mr. HOFFMAN, he withdrew it, explaining that he himself did not deem it necessary; but as others did, he had submitted it in deference to them.

Mr. ROBERTSON then renewed his amendment offered in Committee, modifying it so as to embrace also the substance of one submitted by Mr. MENEFEE, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, with the approbation of the President, to borrow, on the credit of the United States, from time to time, such sums as the President may consider requisite for the public service of the current year, not exceeding in the whole —— millions of dollars, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, payable quarter-yearly, reimbursable at the will of the United States, or at such periods as may be stipulated, not exceeding ——— from the ——— day of ———; to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury, or which may be received therein from other sources during the present year, to defray any public expenditures which are or may be authorized by law. The stock thereby created shall be transferable at the Treasury of the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; which regulations shall be published in such manner as he shall direct. And it is hereby declared, That it shall be deemed a good execution of the said power to borrow, for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to cause to be constituted certificates of stock, signed by the Register of the Treasury, for the sum borrowed, or for any part thereof, bearing an interest, payable as aforesaid, not exceeding —— per centum per annum, transferable and reimbursable as aforesaid, provided said stock shall not be sold under par.

Mr. HOFFMAN then proceeded to reply to Mr. RHETT; and having done so, propounded some questions to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. H. inquired whether it was intended, by this bill, that the Treasury notes issued, and paid back into the Treasury, should be cancelled as they came in?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that, in order to obviate any misconstruction or doubt about that point, he had introduced the amendment agreed to this morning.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then, in no case, is the issue to exceed ten millions of dollars?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. Certainly not.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And will the power to issue expire on the 31st of December, 1838, as in the act of the 12th of October?

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that, as the bill originally stood, according to his construction of it, it carried with it all the provisions of that act; but some doubts having been expressed by various gentlemen, to obviate them he had extended the clause by inserting the words, "subject to all the conditions, limitations, and restrictions" of that act. Consequently, this bill would expire at the time indicated in the antecedent one.

Mr. HOFFMAN admitted that he had not paid strict attention to the amendment at the time it was offered. He then went on to express his dissent, and to give his reasons therefor, from the mode of relief proposed, Treasury notes were objectionable, because they were unproductive, and always would be depreciated; and quoted, in proof of this, the testimony of Mr. Gallatin. Mr. H. then adverted to the free banking scheme, which was, as yet, an untried experiment, and stated his objections to some of its features. In reference to any mode of relief, he expressed himself in favor of a direct loan.

Mr. THOMPSON made some explanations in reply to Mr. H.

Mr. JONES of Virginia went into a general defence of the bill, and in reply to the arguments urged against it by others.

Mr. WISE went at length into an opposition to the bill, upon the ground that it was better to create a loan direct, than to resort to the measure now proposed. He was willing to take it for granted that the necessity for supplies existed; and commented upon the course of the Administration, which had resulted in that effect. He said it was extraordinary that the financiers of the Government should say that they had abundant means, and yet should be compelled to use their credit to raise money; and he made statements to show that the distress and embarrassment which had fallen upon the Government and the merchants had also reached the mass of the community, and was most oppressive in the valley of the Mississippi. When the issue of Treasury notes was first proposed, the same story of abundant means and temporary expedients was held out, and it was said that time was wanted for the merchant to pay their bonds, for the deposite banks to pay what they owed, and the issue of Treasury notes would accomplish all that was desired. All this had been granted, and now, in the same way, more time was asked, and the issuing of more Treasury notes. He referred to the objection that there was not time to negotiate a loan, and said he thought, though he was not authorized to say so, that Nicholas Biddle would take the loan, and pay the ten millions in specie. That monster, he said, had withstood the colossal power of the Government when it was colossal; and had maintained the credit of his bank at home and abroad; and now that the Government was weak and was brought into contempt every where, Nicholas Biddle was able to loan the ten millions which the Government required to sustain their fiscal operations. Mr. W. went into various arguments to prove that the action of the Government in relation to the currency had been founded in bad policy, and then condemned the issuing of Treasury notes as imprudent and unsafe.

He compared the present issue with that of Continental money under the Confederation, and called this the least valuable promise, because it was not præsenti, but præsenti solvendum in futuro; and, after describing a note of the old emission, he showed and described a caricature of the Treasury notes, and inferred that the people held such expedients of the Government in derision. He concluded by again repeating that he would aid the Government with all needful funds, but he preferred the direct, open, manner of a loan.

Mr. BYNUM replied to some of the attacks made upon the Administration, and contended that the proposed mode of obtaining funds was adopted in order to prevent a pressure upon the merchants, who had asked for extension, and to prevent a sudden and oppressive call upon the States for the moneys deposited with them. It was a measure intended to aid and relieve the country, and he remarked severely upon the conduct of the opponents of the Administration, comparing it with that of the parties in olden times, when power was swayed by the hands of the priestcraft, and was used to oppress and plunder the people, whom it endeavored to blind, and keep in ignorance and submission. Since the light of knowledge had burst upon the world, and the wickedness of the rulers had been exposed, there was little danger that the people could be long enslaved; and it was in consequence of the enlightened condition of the age that the dominance of the bank had been resisted and crushed. He went fully into an examination of the charges against the Administration, and into a defence of its measures.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana said, if it was not the intention of the House to take the question this evening, he would prefer an adjournment; and accordingly made such a motion.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND then withdrew his motion to adjourn; and said if there were no other gentlemen disposed to address the House, he would waive his right, and permit the question to be taken.

Other gentlemen having indicated a wish to address the House,

Mr. GARLAND then proceeded to comment upon the extraordinary character of the President's message, and the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, and continued at length an investigation of various questions connected with the state of the currency, when he yielded the floor to.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, who moved an adjournment.

Mr. HAYNES called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 64, nays 125.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND continued his remarks, insisting that a loan was preferable to the issue of Treasury notes, and that a loan could be readily and speedily negotiated in this country; and defending the conduct of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, in the purchase of cotton, for the purpose of aiding southern planters, and paying the foreign debt of the country. He maintained that it was better to resort to a loan in Europe, rather than to this measure, and supported that ground by reference to the practice of the Government in past times, and especially to the times of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, who had all been in favor of that mode of obtaining necessary supplies. When Mr. GARLAND had concluded,

Mr. CUSHMAN remarked that the subject had been fully discussed, and the hour was late, so he moved the previous question.

Mr. CRAIG moved a call of the House which was ordered—ayes 83, noes 52.

Mr. POPE, after the names had been called, moved a suspension of the proceedings in the call, and stated that he knew a number of gentlemen had paired off, upon both sides, with the intention of not returning.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 76, noes 77.

The Clerk was then about to proceed to call the absentees, when one hundred and ninety-nine members being ascertained to be present.

On motion of Mr. GRANT, the further proceeding on the call were dispensed with—ayes 104, noes not counted

The question was then taken on the motion for the previous question, and resulted—ayes 98, noes 95, so the call for the previous question was seconded.

Mr. BELL demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put, which were ordered, and were, yeas 99, nays 99, a tie; the CHAIR voting in the affirmative, made ayes 100, noes 99; so the main question was ordered.

Mr. GRENNELL asked for the yeas and nays thereon, which was the engrossment of the bill; and being ordered, they were, yeas 106, nays 99; as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nath. Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Potter, Pratt, Prentiss, Rariden, Reily, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Sheffer, Sheplor, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Halstead, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, Henry Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, C. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Patterson, Peck, Pope, Potts, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Yorke—99.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and having been engrossed and put on its passage,

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to report a bill to authorize the sale of the bonds of the Bank of the United States, and in the event that they could not be sold in time, then to authorize the issue of two millions of Treasury notes for the immediate wants of the Government; and also to authorize a loan of such sum as might be necessary for the actual wants of the Government, until such sale can be made.

Mr. CUSHMAN then moved the previous question; which was seconded—ayes 104, noes not counted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, and having been ordered were, yeas 103, nays 94.

Mr. RARIDEN then rose to move a vote of reconsideration; but it was not in order.

Messrs. BRIGGS, ROBERTSON, and WISE, simultaneously called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused.

Mr. BELL raised the point of order, that Mr. RARIDEN'S motion was in order; but, after a few words from the CHAIR, dropped it.

The bill was then passed, and the question being on adopting the title,

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out the words, "to carry into effect the act approved 12th day of October, 1837;" which was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER of Massachusetts moved to insert the following: "to meet the current expenses of the Government;" which was agreed to.

The title, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN then rose and said, for the purpose of placing himself and his friends in a correct attitude before this nation, he would give notice that he should move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed. He preferred the amendment proposing to provide means partly by loan, and partly by Treasury notes, to meet the immediate wants of the Government, though he should still vote for the bill if that proposition should be rejected.

On motion, at about quarter past 10 o'clock,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, May 16, 1838.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the joint resolution submitted by Mr. CLAY, proposing to make bank notes receivable and payable in the receipts and expenditures of the Government, made a detailed report thereon; which was read.

Mr. BENTON moved that the report be printed; which motion was carried.

Mr. ALLEN rose and said he would only observe that this was a very important paper, embracing a subject all interesting to the whole people of this country. It was also very long and elaborate—too much so to undergo a very extensive publication by the ordinary public journals of the country. To supply its absence from these journals would require a very large number of copies to be printed by order of the Senate. In looking into the journals of the Senate to see what had been the practice of the Senate on the subject, he found that the report made by the Post Office Committee in 1834, was ordered to be printed with an extra number of copies, amounting to 30,000. He also found that the numerous documents appended to this report were ordered to be printed to the number of 30,000. The order for this printing passed the Senate by a vote of 26 to 14. Mr. A. here, at the request of several gentlemen, read the yeas and nays on the occasion referred to. Believing this document to be much more important than the Post Office report of 1834, and that it was essential that the people should have the fullest information on the interesting subject involved, he was for printing the largest number of copies that had ever been ordered in that body—which was 30,000.

Mr. CLAY expressed himself willing to vote for the printing, and he only wished gentlemen to agree among themselves what number they wanted, and he would vote for it. He was surprised, however, that the chairman of the committee had not thought fit to move some disposition of the resolution upon which this report was made. It had been a sufficient time before the committee, and from the importance of the subject, the public would expect some action on it. He complained that the course of the chairman was unparliamentary, and that it was treating the resolution unfairly to throw it aside in the way that it had been done.

Mr. MORRIS entirely concurred with his colleague as to the importance of the document just read. He thought it was just such a paper as ought to be extensively circulated to disabuse the public mind on this important subject. If he could call back the money which has been expended in printing this session, he would willingly go to the expense of printing half a million of copies; but as that could not be done, he was willing to go to the extent moved by his colleague. For his part, he thought each Senator ought to have 1000 copies to distribute, and he would therefore move to print 52,000, instead of 30,000 copies.

Mr. CLAY still thought that it was incumbent on the chairman of the committee to which the resolution had been referred, to move for its disposition in some way or other. It was true that the chairman had made a very voluminous report on the subject referred to him; but he recommended no action whatever on the resolution, and he therefore supposed that it was his intention to consider it as finally settled.

Mr. HUBBARD observed in reply to Mr. CLAY, that when the report was introduced, it was distinctly stated by the chairman that he was directed by the Committee on Finance, to report back the resolution without amendment. The reading of the report was immediately called for, and commenced, occupying the whole morning, so that the chairman had no opportunity of making any motion whatever, if disposed to do so. Besides the resolution was reported strictly in accordance with parliamentary practice (without amendment,) and would take its place on the calendar, liable to be called up at any moment by a vote of the Senate. So far from its being unparliamentary, as alleged by the Senator from Kentucy, the report was made in the usual course, and in strict conformity with the parliamentary rule. He himself intended as soon as this debate was disposed of, to move to take up the resolution, and assign an early day for its consideration.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said if it was the intention of the committee to put the resolution in the Calendar, to meet its fate during the session, it was equivalent to suppressing it altogether. The subject was one of such thrilling interest to the whole community, that he supposed it was entitled to an earlier consideration, without throwing it into the mass, or rather at the tail of all the business of the Senate.

Mr. HUBBARD said that the Senator could move to take up the resolution at any time, and that it was his province to do so as much as that of any member of the committee. It was not the wish of the committee to put the resolution behind the other business of the Senate; on the contrary, he had intimated his intention of moving to assign an early day for its consideration. He would name any day the Senator pleased.

Mr. KING remarked that the Senator from Kentucky had no reason to complain of the course pursued by the committee in reporting back this resolution. The committee had reported in the usual manner, and it was competent for the Senate to move to take it up at any time. There was no disposition on the part of the committee, or, he believed, of the Senate, to delay its consideration. While up he would take notice of the motion made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] to amend that of his colleague so as to print the extraordinary number of 52,000 copies. Now he, for one, was opposed to printing an unusual number of documents, to be laid on the tables of members, and thrown aside as useless. This waste in printing was an evil that was growing from day to day, and it was time that it should be ended. He was opposed to the printing of the immense number of extra copies of the Post Office report in 1834, and he was equally opposed to the printing of so unusual a number now. He admitted that the report was a very able one, and ought to be widely disseminated. He thought it was calculated to do much good; but he thought that 10,000 copies would be sufficient, and he would go for that number, and no more.

Mr. HUBBARD said he believed from his knowledge of the handwriting of the gentleman who made the report, that it would not make more than twenty-four or twenty-five printed pages of the size of the usual pamphlet in which the speeches are published.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, hoped the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] would withdraw his motion, and let the question be taken on that of his colleague, to print 30,000 copies. He was not disposed to follow the example set by gentlemen in the other House, who opposed the Administration in every thing, though he was willing, on the score of economy, to limit himself to voting for the largest number that had ever been printed. In regard to this important document he was willing to go to the extent moved by the Senator from Ohio first up, [Mr. ALLEN,] which was the number printed of the Post Office Report, though it was agreed on all hands that the publication of this document would not cost more than one-tenth of what that did.

Mr. GRUNDY said the largest number ever printed for the Senate was 30,000, which was the Post Office document. As he conceived this document one of far greater importance to the people, he expressed his readiness to vote for that number, but nothing beyond it.

Mr. BENTON advocated the printing of the greatest number, and avowed his determination to vote on each question for the largest number. The document was one of great importance to the country, and would not cost a tythe of that which had been sent from this body, some sessions since, in relation to the concerns of the General Post Office.

Mr. TALLMADGE opposed the printing of the number moved by the Senator from Ohio, and said that he would not go beyond the number suggested by the Senator from Alabama. Mr. T. adverted to the printing of 30,000 copies of the report of the Post Office Committee in 1834, which he said he voted against. His share of the copies, he said, was sent to him by mail, after he left Washington; and after they had remained in the post office of his town for some time, the postmaster begged him to take them away, saying that he had no room for them. He then took them and disposed of them to a grocer, to be used as wrapping paper in his business; and the grocer informed him that they constituted a supply sufficient to last him two years. As to the portion that had been sent to his colleage, he had been informed by him that they had been used for wadding for cannon, in celebrating political victories. Now, he did not know but these documents, if the Senate ordered the printing of so large a number, might be used in the same way, and become wadding for the cannon that shall celebrate Whig victories. Mr. T. then reviewed the report, which he considered as condemning the former action of the Senate in relation to the Specie circular.

Mr. MORRIS withdrew his motion to print 52,000 copies, so that the question recurred on printing 32,000 copies, as moved by Mr. ALLEN.

Mr. ALLEN observed, that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] should find any difficulty in disposing of his share of this document, he would gladly agree to borrow them from him, and to give him, in return, his share of the first good Whig report that should be printed. There was no danger that this document would be used as wadding for cannon to celebrate Whig victories. He thought, from its force, that it was much more likely to become a cannon itself, and reach its object.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana contended that the printing of so great a number was unnecessary, as the report only embodied the arguments set forth in the different able speeches which had been delivered on the occasion, and which were already before the public.

Mr. STRANGE regretted the Senator from Ohio had withdrawn his proposition. The document was one, in his opinion, of vast importance to the country, and could not be too liberally disseminated. Mr. S. said the people of his State were crying out for information on this all absorbing question, and claimed for the majority the advantage of its position to disseminate all reports which, like this one, were based on truth and sound argument.

The question was then taken on printing 30,000 copies, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 23, nay 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Webster, Williams, and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, and White—19.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. CLAY's resolution was taken up, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said he would send an amendment to the CHAIR, which he intended to offer when the resolution should come up, and which he now asked might be printed. It was as follows:

Strike out the first clause of the resolution, and insert the following: "That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the funds, or medium of payment, in which debts, or dues to the United States, may be paid."

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, May 17, 1838.

As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. RARIDEN rose to make the motion of which he had given notice last night.

The CHAIR said the consideration of the motion would regularly lie over till the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. RARIDEN asked the House to consider it now.

Mr. GLASCOCK objected at first, but afterwards withdrew it, and Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky renewed the objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN moved a suspension of the rules: lost, only 61 voting in the affirmative.

The CHAIR announced the business in order to be the motion to print 10,000 extra copies of the report of the Militia Committee.

Mr. RUSSELL asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," passed the 23d of June, 1836, as prohibits receiving in payment for dues to the Government, and disbursing the same, the bills of specie paying banks, which issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars.

And, also, so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836," as prohibits the offering in payment, by any officer or department of the Government, notes or bills of specie paying banks, of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

Mr. LINCOLN said he must object to the interposition of any other subject till the above motion was disposed of, which would occupy but a few moments.

Mr. RUSSELL moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were, yeas 56, nays 126, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aycrigg, Biddle, Bond, John Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Davies, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Halstead, Harlan, Henry, Kennedy, Marvin, May, Maxwell, Mercer, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Noyes, Patterson, Peck, Pope, Potts, Pratt, Randolph, Ridgway, Robinson, Russell, Sergeant, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, and Yorke—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Bicknell, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, Deberry, Dennis, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes, Herod, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Hubley, Ingham, T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—126.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. RUSSELL then gave notice that he should call up this resolution to-morrow, and upon each successive day thereafter till it should receive the final action of the House.

The motion to print 10,000 extra copies of the militia report was then taken up and agreed to.

STEAM EXPLOSIONS.

Mr. CUSHMAN appealed to the House to consent to take up the bill to authorize the appointment of persons to test the usefulness of inventions to prevent the explosion of steamboat boilers.

Objection being made—

Mr. CUSHMAN moved a general suspension of the rules, but varied his motion, at the suggestion of Mr. EVERETT, for thirty minutes only; the motion, however, did not prevail.

RECISION OF THE SPECIE CIRCULAR.

Mr. BOON renewed his motion to suspend the rules for half an hour, to consider the resolution to rescind the Specie Circular.

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS asked for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the motion to suspend was rejected.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of A. J. Pickett and another.

Also, a bill for the relief of William A. Whitehead; which was ordered to a third reading tomorrow.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill granting the right of preemption to certain lots in the town of Perrysburg, in the State of Ohio.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported, without amendment, Senate bill directing the Postmaster General to settle the claim of Hard and Longstreet.

Mr. M. stated the nature of the claim, and that it was a case of peculiar emergency, from the fact of the individual interested having suffered severely by the late conflagration in Charleston. Mr. M. moved that the House go into committee upon it at once.

Mr. BRIGGS also made an earnest appeal to the House in behalf of the motion.

Mr. LEGARE also beseeched the House to assent, as an act of mercy to the claimant, under the circumstances stated by Messrs. MONTGOMERY, and BRIGGS.

Mr. ADAMS wanted to know something more about it, and why the Postmaster General did not settle it at once.

Mr. THOMPSON explained from the want of power, and appealed to the House, as an act of mercy as well as justice, to act upon the bill.

Mr. BRIGGS again explained the nature of the claim, and stated that, as a case of equity, it was strongly recommended by the Postmaster General, and unanimously reported upon by the committees of both Houses.

Mr. UNDERWOOD opposed it strongly, as he was indisposed to give this bill a preference over bills reported for the burning of houses in the Revolutionary war. He should not consent to it, and moved it be made the order of the day for tomorrow.

Mr. ADAMS also opposed the motion originally made, and the bill too, and expressed a hope that the last motion would prevail.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was very certain that if the House had consented to his motion, the bill would have been disposed of before then. It was an extraordinary case, and he did not believe there would be a single vote against it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, at this stage, moved the orders of the day, and the bill lies over.

Mr. HOWARD asked the gentleman to withdraw the motion, in order to take up the "hardware bill."

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that that bill was already on its final passage.

The motion for the orders prevailed.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The motion of Mr. RARIDEN to reconsider the vote and the passage of this bill was then announced by the CHAIR.

Mr. RARIDEN took that occasion to explain that he was himself in favor of voting all necessary supplies to the Government, but differed with the majority of the House as to the proper mode; and the object of his motion was to give himself and his friends an opportunity of setting themselves right before the country. He preferred a partial issue of Treasury notes, and the remainder to be raised by a direct loan. Mr. R. added that time was of far more importance at this period of the session than the mode of raising means; and, so far from desiring to bring on a protracted debate, he would himself, should such spring up, vote for the previous question. He only wanted an opportunity for himfelf and his friends to place their names on the record, so that they could not be misunderstood.

Mr BOON thought this measure had already been debated long enough; and he, therefore, moved the previous question.

Mr. RIVES propounded an inquiry of the CHAIR whether, if a motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table should prevail, the bill would cohere with it.

The CHAIR had given this question some attention, and went on to explain substantially, we believe, to the following effect; that as no motion now could be made to lay the bill on the table, ergo no collateral motion could have that effect.

Mr. RIVES was decidedly of that opinion, and therefore asked the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his demand for the previous question.

Mr. BOON declined.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and proceeded in till the roll had been called through once; when

Mr. CUSHING moved to dispense with it.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays, which being ordered,

Mr. CUSHING withdrew the motion.

The roll was then called through a second time, and two hundred and fifteen members having answered to their names,

Mr. CURTIS moved that it be further dispensed with.

Mr CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays, and as they were ordered,

Mr. CURTISS withdrew the motion, but

Mr. ATHERTON renewed it, and

Mr. OWENS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 117, nays 84.

So the further proceedings on the call were dispensed with; and the question recurring on the demand for the previous question—

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio inquired if the previous question was sustained, what the main question would be?

The CHAIR replied on the reconsideration.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired what would then be the situation of the bill?

The CHAIR said the effect would be, if the House should affirm the motion to reconsider, that the question would then be on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. Then, sir, should the motion to reconsider the engrossment prevail, would the bill be open to amendment?

The CHAIR thought it would, if that motion was in order, and a motion to recommit the bill prevail.

Mr. WISE. Would that motion then be in order?

The CHAIR said he thought it would at another stage.

The House then seconded the demand for the previous question, the tellers reporting 119 in the affirmative, and on the question "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. GRAY asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 141, nays 64.

So the House determined that the main question should be now put, and thereon

Mr. BRONSON asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were, yeas 110, nays 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Wm. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoon, W. B. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—109.

The CHAIR voting in the negative, the motion was lost.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but subsequently withdrew the motion.

Mr. JONES of Wisconsin asked leave to submit a resolution setting apart Tuesday and Wednesday, the 5th and 6th June, for the consideration of Territorial business; but it was objected to.

Mr. DOWNING, of Florida, moved a suspension of the rules, which was agreed to, 121 to 52; and the resolution was taken up and agreed to, ayes 119, noes 43.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of War to settle, upon equitable principles, the accounts of Major Thomas W. Harltee, late commandant of the battalion of South Carolina militia engaged in the Florida service, for articles necessary to their comfort, furnished to the troops under his command, and for such expenses as were incurred at the place of rendezvous, and on the march of the said troops.

OREGON TERRITORY.

The message of the President of the United States, in relation to the title of the United States to the Territory west of the Rocky mountains, was taken up.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. CUSHING, to commit the same to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post on the Columbia river for the defence thereof, and the expediency of making further provision by law to prevent any intermeddling by any foreign power with the Indians there, &c.

Mr. CUSHING stated that this was a subject of great interest, which he wished might be presented to the people of the United States. It would lead into a discussion of dry details, which might not interest the House, but which were now most important to be understood and spread before the country. It was a question which involved our relations with other powers, and our interests must be, at any hazard, defended. He did not fear that this question would bring our nation into conflict with any other; but, if it did, that hazard must be encountered, and our rights maintained. He should contend that we had the right to the territory alluded to, to the exclusion of European powers, by the right of discovery, for he maintained that the discovery of an island, carried the whole island, against subsequent discoveries or possession of other parts. If it was a discovery of a continent, it would be governed by circumstances. If it was the discovery of a river, it not only carried the river but the lands that bordered thereon, and the tract of country to its sources. He assumed these principles to be true, because they had always been insisted upon by our country as a part of international law.

He said we had a right, by discovery, because the first discovery and exploration was made by Captain Robert Gray, of Massachusetts, who sailed there in the brig Columbia, and was the first person who visited Columbia river, which he named, after the name of his vessel, the Columbia river. This first exploration was followed by the exploration of Lewis and Clarke, which was complete from the source to the mouth of the same river; and that again was followed by the settlement of John Jacob Astor. Vancouver's discovery, upon which the English found a right, was subsequent to that of Capt. Gray, and he visited the mouth of the river, as he had stated, in consequence of information given him by Captain Gray. The occupancy of the territory, projected by John Jacob Astor in an enlightened spirit, and with the forecast which distinguishes an enterprising merchant, was made in 1805, still previous to the occupancy of any other power; though not under the patronage, yet under the encouragement of the Government of the United States. If that possession had been persisted in, it would now have precluded any foreign nation; but the war of 1812 ensued, and broke up the establishment; and the whole of Mr. Astor's great property there was sacrificed by his treacherous agent, McDougal, who, by collusion with the Northwest Trading Company of Montreal, conveyed the property to them, and became a partner in their concern.

The matter remained thus, till the close of the war, when it was settled by treaty, that the United States should be restored to any possession they had before had to any lands west of the Mississippi before the war; and in consequence of that treaty, the sloop of war Rapid was sent round to take down the flag of St. George, and restore that of the United States upon the Columbia river, yielding the command of the territory to Commodore Biddle. This was, however, merely a political possession, the actual possession still remaining in the hands of the northwest company, and so remaining to the present day. Mr. C. maintained, that the territory was in our country by the first discovery, and by treaty, and that the right was entire and perfect. We held by treaty the right of the only two European powers, which pretended even to have had a claim, besides Great Britain, which were Spain and France.

Hernando Cortez had made a discovery which was anterior to that of the English, and he gave the river the name of Oregon, which it still bears. The English pretended also to claim, under a discovery by Sir Francis Drake, a notorious pirate, who sailed under his own black flag, and who had been ennobled by England, in consequence solely of his atrocious feats of piracy; but, without questioning whether a discovery by a pirate would acquire a right to the soil, Mr. C. said that, as Drake only visited the coast for the purpose of plunder, his landings were only made on parts settled by Spain; and he did not go farther North than the coast now admitted to be within the boundary of New California, which was south of latitude 42°, the Southern boundary of our claim. But whatever right Spain might have had, had been acquired by our Government, by the treaty for the cession of Florida, which was a mutual cession of territory, and not a mere adjustment of claims. The United States had ceded all right to lands south of a certain boundary, and Spain ceded to us all right to lands in Florida, and west of the Mississippi, so that by the Spanish title, which was antecedent to the English, we had a perfect right to the territory.

The only other nation that had pretended to have a title was France, which, by an extension of territory, in consequence of the discovery and possession of Louisiana, and in consequence of the principle that the discovery or possession of the source of a river carried a title to the mouth, might have set up a claim, had conveyed and ceded whatever right or claim might have existed to the United States by the treaty of cession of Louisiana.

But Great Britain was precluded also by our treaty of 1763 with that nation, in which they ceded and relinquished all right to lands west of the Mississippi, south of the parallel of 49°; and by a treaty with Russia, it was agreed that they would make no settlement south of the 54th degree, and we agreed to make none north of that parallel, so that by the treaty with Russia, and by the construction of the principle that the discovery of the mouth or river gave a right to all the territory to its source, the title was complete to the 54th degree of latitude.

But Great Britain did not now set up a title to the territory as an original claim, but pretended that it was disputed territory, to which no nation had a title, and which was to be determined by such European nations as had any pretension to it, and by compromise or war. He considered the occupation of that territory by Great Britain now, by military posts, as in violation of national law, and in violation of an express stipulation, by which they had agreed not to occupy any portion of it; and he compared it to their encroachments upon the territory of Maine, unjust and clandestine, as he would show hereafter. But before proceeding, he would appeal to an individual present [Mr. ADAMS] who was a living record of the dipomatic history of the country, if had not truly and correctly stated the facts and treaties, so far as they related to the right of foreign nations to this territory; and if he was not right, he wished to be corrected on the spot.

Mr. ADAMS said that he believed his colleague was perfectly right in his facts, as far as he recollected, but there might be differences of opinion upon the principles, and he was not prepared to concede that the discovery of a part of an island carried the whole island. He referred to the grant of all undiscovered lands made by Pope Alexander to Spain and Portugal, and went at length into the history of various European controversies respecting titles to this continent; after which he spoke of various discoveries, such as the mouth of the Mississippi, Lake Ontario, and the Texas lands, upon which he spoke at length. He also referred to the signing of the Florida treaty, and spoke of the question of veracity raised between himself and President Jackson, two years since, upon the subject of the Mexican boundary, stating that he had placed in the hands of President Van Buren, evidence that he [Mr. ADAMS] was correct in his statements upon that subject.

Mr. CUSHING then resumed; but after proceeding a few minutes, gave way to

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, May 17, 1838.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of a large number of merchants of the city of New York, praying that a drawback may be allowed on foreign coal imported for the use of steam ships.

Mr. WRIGHT also presented the petition of General Ezra ———, praying relief from a suit instituted against him by the United States: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which the subject had been referred by a resolution of the Senate, reported a bill to establish an additional land office in Louisiana; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Also, a bill for the relief of the heirs of James Latham; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the University of Pennsylvania, asking a grant of land for the benefit of that institution: granted.

Also, from the petition of the trustees of —— College, Mississippi, asking a grant for the same purpose: granted.

Also, from the memorial of certain citizens of Boone county, Illinois, praying a grant of land for the benefit of Bellevue College: granted.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the following resolution submitted by him, on Tuesday last, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia procure and report to the Senate statements of the condition of the several banks in the District of Columbia that have applied for an extension of their charters, in regard to the following particulars:

1. The names of the officers and directors of the banks, the amount of stock owned by each, and the debts due from each to the banks respectively, discriminating between the executive, legislative, and judicial officers of the Government among them, and also between residents and non-residents.

2. The stockholders of the banks respectively, the amount of stock owned by each, and of debts due from each, discriminating as above.

3. The debtors to the banks respectively, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

4. The number of suits that the banks respectively have instituted against their debtors since the suspension of specie payments, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

Mr. ROANE expressed a very earnest desire to have some decision on the District bank bill. To wait until the information sought for by the resolution was obtained, would be, in his opinion, to create unnecessary delay; and as much of the information sought for by the mover was already in possession of the public, and the other portion useless for any practical purpose, he should feel nimself constrained to move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. ALLEN said he presumed the motion of the gentleman from Virginia precluded debate; he would therefore have to content himself with asking for the yeas and nays on the motion, intimating his intention, if the resolution was strangled in its incipiency, to take occasion to offer his views in some stage of the discussion on the bill.

The question having been taken, was decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Merrick, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, and Young —17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, and Wright—18.

Mr. ALLEN then said it was not his intention to enter into any discussion of the merits of the question at that time, but merely to respond to an observation of the honorale Chairman, who had asserted that much of the information sought for by the resolution, was already in possession of the Senate. If such were the fact, he was not aware of it. Mr. A. thought it was an anomaly in American legislation to undertake to charter a whole forest of banks while they were acting in open violation of the public law of the land, and to seek to do it without any investigation into their present condition or prior conduct. Congress was asked to set a moral example, by rewarding the violators of the law, for such in fact would be the consequence of a renewal of these charters for twenty years on the terms set forth in the bill. When Congress proposed to inquire into the conduct of these institutions on prior occasions, we were told that was a matter entirely immaterial; "that the people of this district demanded their recharter." If this were so, where were the petitions to that effect? It had been stated that these banks were indispensable to the business concerns of this district, to the wants of the people, and when a resolution was offered inquiring into the facts, it was sought to be strangled in its birth. Mr. A. wished to see whether these banks were for the benefit of the District of Columbia, or for the people of other States and Territories. He had been told the people here were the smallest participants. It was said there were more poverty and want in these ten miles square than in any part of this country. If so, how happened it to be where there are the greatest number of these banks? It had been said that we propose an inquiry into the private affairs of the banks! These institutions were emanations from public law, and the people had a right to know all that related to them. When they were asking for their charters they were public institutions; but when once granted, they could the very next day take shelter under the sanctity of private concerns. He denied the right of public institutions to have any private transactions, which might not be brought to light. Mr. A. was ignorant that the information he sought could affect public men; but if it did, he could not help that. He did not know a public man that owed the first dollar to any bank in the country. His object was to guard the whole community, by throwing round these institutions proper guards and proper restraints; and he, for one, was desirous of separating the Government in toto from all banks and banking connection; and he was prompted to this by the most solemn considerations that it would be for the benefit of the country.

Mr. A. then went into the subject at some length, to show that on another occasion a resolution had passed the Senate making inquiry into the conduct of a public man in connection with banks, (a late Secretary of the Treasury,) which had been passed without a dissenting voice. Mr. A. alluded to Mr. Taney, and the triumphant manner in which that pure, but persecuted, statesman had vindicated his public and private conduct from all aspersion.

Mr. A. read from the minutes of the Bank of the Metropolis a resolution which had passed the board, at which a judge of the Supreme Court was a director, declaring all transactions of the board confidential on the part of the directors and officers of the bank. Here, then, was a bank with a high public functionary in its direction, passing a by-law to secrete their transactions from the public eye; and was this to be tolerated, the people to remain in ignorance, and at last, in all probability, made to suffer losses from the very acts of the institution?

Mr. A. cited also the stoppage of the Bank of Washington on a certain occasion when a draft had been presented for 20,000 dollars, during the prior panic, and commented, with much severity, on the business. He concluded by expressing a hope that there would be no objection to the passage of the resolution, and maintained there was sufficient justification to be found in the very document he had quoted, which had been signed by the President of the Bank of the Metropolis.

Mr. SEVIER observed that for the last eight or ten years, no subject in this country, as far as his knowledge extended, had been so fully exhausted in the way of argument, by politicians and by every party man in the country, as that of banks and their abuses. He thought the Senate would bear him witness, that for that length of time the public had been treated with hardly any thing else. After arraigning, trying, and almost hanging like a felon the Bank of the United States, certain politicians were now entering into a crusade against the State banks. They had been told the other day that they must make the little banks of this District models for the State institutions. Yes, said Mr. S. we are to set ourselves up as examples for our masters. We are too apt in this hall, he continued, to be looking down with contempt upon what is done in the States, and to chalk out what we deem the right course for them. Some States might be tame enough to submit to this; but there was one gallant little State that would spurn at any such dictation; and would not condescend to take advice from this quarter on matters relating to her own interests We may, said Mr. S. go on attacking the banking institutions in this way, and what will be the consequence? Just the disasters of the last two years. It was time for them to be considering what they were doing, or they might expect a repetition of the treatment they had already received. He was for fostering these institutions, instead of persecuting them. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio, under consideration, asked for the private accounts of individuals with these banks, and there had been much talk about members of Congress borrowing money from them. Did the Senator allege that any body here was bribed? If so, let him point out the man, and try him upon a special warrant, and not by general accusation.

Did the gentleman from Ohio suppose there was any thing wrong in borrowing money? Why his own State did it, he himself saw her agents the other day in New York, trying to raise a loan, and he was jostled by them in Wall street, when he went there on the same business. Yes, sir, said he, they went to borrow money from the titled aristocrats of Europe—from the Barings and Rothschilds. The gentleman seemed to think that no man would vote for a bank without getting money for it. Did he believe that there was no such thing as patriotism? There were many men in favor of banks, who did not want to borrow money, and there were others opposed to them who did borrow money. But of the class opposed to the banks, he had the most respect for those whose opposition was based on constitutional grounds.

After some further remarks in opposition to the resolution, Mr. S. expressed the opinion that the best way of disposing of it would be to lay it on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD spoke at length in opposition to the resolution. He inquired if the object of the Senator from Ohio, was to ascertain the number of public men that had accommodations in these banks, and to draw an inference therefrom, that they could not with propriety vote for their recharter. Mr. H. could not conceive that such an exhibit would do any good, and might be productive of embarrassment to individuals. It could make no difference to debtors, whether the banks were rechartered or not—if they were, they would still have their debts to pay; and if they were not, they could not be relieved from them. The recharter of these banks were asked for by the people of this District, to whom he thought some consideration was due. He presumed the banks were so managed by their directors as to insure the best interests of those institutions. Mr. H. avowed his wish to separate the Government from all connection with banks, and would go all length with the Senator from Ohio to effect so desirable an object.

Mr. ROANE begged leave to explain that his object in moving to lay the resolution on the table, was simply to avoid debate that they might proceed at once to the bill to charter the District banks. His opinion was that the information sought for by the resolution was not necessary to enable the Senate to form a correct judgment on the merits of the bill; and he deprecated the attempt to bring to light the private affairs of individuals. But, said he, let the information come: "my withers are unwrung;" he did not owe a dollar to one of these District banks, and if he did it would not prevent him from voting judiciously and honestly with regard to them all. Mr. R. did not consider that the passage of the bill would be rewarding these banks for rebelling against the laws, as the Senator from Ohio intimated. What, said he, reward them with charters on harder conditions than were ever imposed on a bank in any quarter of the United States?

After some further remarks from Messrs. CLAY and ALLEN—

Mr. TIPTON moved to lay the resolution on the table, for the purpose of ending the debate, and proceeding to the consideration of the bill to recharter the District banks.

This motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster and Young—31.

NAYS—Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Lumpkin, McKean, Niles, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut and Wright—10.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia. The question being on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, already given—

Mr. BENTON rose and observed that since the publication of his remarks on this bill, in which he had quoted some of the testimony given before the committee of the House of Representatives, relative to the transactions of District banks, he had been called on by Mr. Raphael Semmes, a director of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, there referred to, and that Mr. Semmes had pointed out to him in a subsequent part of the report, which had escaped his notes, some additional testimony given by Mr. Prout, the broker, in which that gentleman states that he was mistaken in having said that Mr. Semmes was one of the directors to whom he had sold notes and stock; that on after reflection, he was satisfied that he had made no such sales to Mr. Semmes.

Mr. B. said he had also been called on by Mr. William Jewell, of Georgetown, whose testimony he had quoted in the same speech, and that Mr. Jewell had produced a certificate from the cashier of the Farmers and Mechanics Bank, stating that he was not a director of that bank at the time he purchased the $15,000 of stock from the widow, but that he was a director at the time he gave the testimony. Mr. B. said that in justice to these gentlemen he made this explanation at the earliest opportunity.

After some remarks from Messrs. BUCHANAN, CUTHBERT, CRITTENDEN, DAVIS, and HUBBARD, the question was taken on Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment; and it was rejected—yeas 19, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, King, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, and Webster—21.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend the bill by striking out the word "fourth," and inserting "third," in the fifth line of the twenty-ninth section; the effect of which is to require the banks to keep on hand an amount of coin equal to one third (instead of one fourth) of their circulation; which amendment was adopted—ayes 32, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Swift, Trotter, Webster, Wright, and Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Tallmadge, and Tipton—10.

Mr. NILES moved a further amendment, by striking out in the same section, all after the word "circulation," and inserting, "and should the amount in any one quarter fall short of that proportion, the president and directors for the time being shall be responsible in their individual capacities to all the bill-holders and depositors; and in case of inability of said corporation, or expiration of its charter, or in case its charter shall be annulled, the said president and directors shall be liable in their individual capacities to each and every creditor of said corporation."

After some remarks from Messrs. GRUNDY, NILES, TALLMADGE, CLAY, KING, HUBBARD, and ROANE, the bill was laid over informally; and

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the Government, reported the same without amendment, and gave notice that he should call it up to-morrow, immediately after reading the journal,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, MAY 18, 1838.

Mr. HENRY, on leave, presented the petition of William McMellen, who was a lieutenant in the Revolutionary war, by his daughter and only child, Margaret Patterson, praying commutation in consequence of his services to the end of the war, in pursuance of the resolutions and acts of Congress in favor of Revolutionary officers; and also the documents in relation to the services of said Lieutenant McMellen, on the files of this House, report No. 147 of January 10th, 1832; and on motion, all referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. RUSSELL renewed his application to the House to the resolution presented by him yesterday.

Objection being made,

Mr. R. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HUNTER of Ohio asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio solicited Mr. RUSSELL to withdraw his motion, and permit the committees to report.

Mr. RUSSEL would do so for the present, but he should call it up the first opportunity, without encroaching upon the privileges of the House.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. BELL, on leave, presented three several communications from the Secretary of War: 1. A memorial of the Creek Indians, for compensation for losses suffered in their emigration west: 2. A similar one from the Choctaws: 3. A memorial from Major Graham, for Seminole losses.

The consideration of Senate bill for the relief of Hard and Longstreet was resumed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD had moved its regular commitment.

Mr. BRIGGS appealed to the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD had no objection to the claim, but was disinclined to give it a preference over numerous others equally meritorious.

Mr. ELMORE explained the circumstances of the claim, and made an earnest appeal to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD'S motion was disagreed to, the bill was committed for this day, and, on motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, the House went into committee thereon, (Mr. BOON in the chair,) and was so amended, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, as to provide that the amount found due to the claimants should be paid out of the funds of the Post Office Department.

The committee then rose and reported the bill to the House; and the amendment being concurred in, the bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of James Cox.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which was referred the petition and papers of Clark Allen for compensation for horses and other property destroyed in the military service of the United States, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Clark Allen, and that the same be referred to the Third Auditor of the Treasury for settlement, under the act of January 18, 1836.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill further to provide for the relief of distressed American seamen in foreign countries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill to provide for the payment of certain judgments which have been or may be obtained against the State of Virginia.

Mr. U. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the heirs of John Mountjoy, praying a pension: laid on the table.

Mr. U. from same committee, reported unfavorably on the petition of the heirs of William Stevenson, praying commutation pay; also, on the petition of Elisha Adair, praying indemnity for losses by continental money; which were laid on the table.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert White.

Mr. T. also reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of James Hackett.

Mr. PARMENTER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported unfavorably on the petition of Ebenezer Lester, praying compensation for labor performed during the Revolutionary war: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported unfavorably on the petition of the heirs of James Emmett, for compensation for loss of team during the Revolutionary war: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, reported unfavorably on the petition of James Moore, praying compensation for loss of wagon and team during the Revolutionary war: laid on the table.

Mr. S. also reported unfavorably on the petition of Lucy Williamson, praying commutation on account of Revolutionary services of her father: laid on the table.

Mr. POTTER, from the Committee on Revolution Claims, reported unfavorably on the petition of the heirs of Gov. Rice of Virginia, for commutation pay: laid on the table.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported unfavorably on the petition of William Smith, praying indemnity for slaves taken by the Indians in Georgia: laid on the table.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an adverse report on the resolution of the House of April 16, proposing to confine the instruction in the military academy at West Point to the elements and practice of civil and military engineering: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKAY, from the same committee reported unfavorably on the petition of A. M. Caldwell, praying compensation as ensign in the service of the United States: laid on the table.

Mr. McKAY, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the resolution of the House proposing to erect an arsenal in Lincoln county, North Carolina: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKAY also reported unfavorably on the petition of the Missouri Light Artillery Company: laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petition of James Leslie, praying a pension for services rendered the United States: laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act entitled an act for the relief of certain pensioners therein named, passed the 2d of March, 1833, as grants a pension to Jesse Cunningham.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill to establish a pension agency at McMinville, in the State of Tennessee; which was read twice, and ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

PENSION AGENCY AT MONTPELIER, VERMONT.

Mr. M. also reported, without amendment, Senate bill to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, in the State of Vermont.

Mr. M. also moved that it be put on its passage.

Mr. ALLEN of Vermont moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont, inquired if it was necessary to commit this bill?

The CHAIR replied that it was not, but the House might commit it if it saw fit.

Mr. FLETCHER wished his colleague then to State the reasons for his motion. The bill, it would be seen, provided that the agency should be established on the first of June, but, if the gentleman's motion should prevail, the bill could not be reached till long after that day. If his colleague was opposed to the bill, let him say so at once, and not seek to kill it in this indirect mode.

Mr. ALLEN said that he wished to examine into the facts of the bill, and the extent of it, for he thought there were other portions of the State that could be selected far more advantageous than Montpelier, say Burlington or Windsor.

He had a further objection to the bill. There was no need of passing a distinct measure for the establishment of a pension agency at a particular point, for there was a law in force conferring the power upon the Secretary of War, or the Commissioner of Pensions, whenever they deemed it expedient, and they were the proper persons in whom such a duty should be reposed.

Mr. FLETCHER would ask then why it was that all these matters were not left to those officers? It would be seen that the House had but this moment ordered a similar bill, applying to another State, to a third reading, and had passed some two or three during the present session. Mr. F. then went to describe the inconveniences now felt by the pensioners in that part of Vermont proposed to be accommodated by this bill, many of whom had actually to pass through Montpelier if they received their pensions in person, or to employ agents for that purpose at considerable expense. To be sure, his colleague resided at Burlington, but then Mr. F. did not reside at Montpelier, and he only advocated the general interest of that whole section of country which wanted this accommodation. Mr. F. also put some questions to his colleague as to whether certain portions of the State would not be better accommodated by the agency at Montpelier than at Burlington or Windsor, and added that he objected to the commitment of the bill, because it would have the effect of giving it its death blow.

Mr. ALLEN replied that the facts about which his colleague had inquired were those which Mr. A. wished to examine into for himself, and though it might be done in the House, he thought the Committee of the Whole the more fitting place to go into them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD wished to propound another inquiry to the chairman of the Revolutionary Pension Committee. A year ago, Mr. U. had made an application both to the Secretary of War and to the Commissioner of Pensions, for the establishment of a pension agency in the southern part of Kentucky, without expense, but he was unsuccessful. Now, the pensioners in that section of country had to travel from one to two and three hundred miles to get their pensions, and he could get no relief for them under the general law, if there was one; notwithstanding which he saw there from time to time these little bills passing to accommodate other States, like Vermont, which were not one third the size of Kentucky. The question he wished to propound to the chairman of the committee was, how these things were to be managed so that his [Mr. U's] constituents might be benefitted by the information?

Mr. MORGAN replied that he was not aware that any instructions had been given to the committee, either by the gentleman himself, or by any other member from Kentucky, to that effect; but if any should come before the committee, he could assure the gentleman that it would receive its early attention; and they would report upon it as speedily as possible.

Mr. FLETCHER then called for the reading of a document from the Commissioner of Pensions, which turned out to be adverse to the establishment of an agency at Montpelier.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio complained that these bills contained no safeguards against an improper use of the public money; a subject of itself of so much importance, that it merited further investigation; and he wished an opportunity of discussing both bills.

The CHAIR remarked that the other bill was passed.

Mr. ALLEN'S motion in reference to this bill prevailed, and it was committed.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, reported a bill making appropriations for repairs and improvements on certain buildings and grounds, and for other purposes.

Mr. SERGEANT inquired of the gentleman when he proposed to call up the bill in relation to the new Treasury building. He was induced to do so on account of the distressed condition of the operatives on the building, who were understood to have been discharged without any certain prospect of their speedy re-engagement.

Mr. LINCOLN replied that, as soon as this bill was committed, he should report a resolution to take that subject up. Mr. L. took that opportunity to state that the bill referred to by the gentleman was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but, since it was last under discussion, the President of the United States had put the whole subject in commission, under the superintendence of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury. The Committee on the Public Buildings had received a communication from these gentlemen requesting information, to which the committee were obliged to respond, that they had no other means of information than was possessed by the Commissioners themselves. Mr. L. stated that there was a great number of laborers and artisans who would be discharged from employment in this city, many of whom had large families dependent upon them for support and daily bread, and consequently great distress would result, unless this subject was early acted upon. In view of this the committee had instructed him to report the resolution he should presently introduce.

The above bill was then read twice, and committed.

Mr. LINCOLN then reported a resolution proposing that the House go into committee at 12 o'clock to-day on the bill to provide for the removal of the walls of the new Treasury Building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER said he felt it his duty to notify the House that he had had in his possession, for several days, a memorial from persons who had been employed on this building, but had had no opportunity of presenting it.

Mr. SERGEANT hoped the House would consent to its presentation at that time.

Mr. YELL objected, and demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered, and were, ayes 70, noes 99; so the resolution was rejected.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to regulate the postage on letters, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALL, on leave, presented an amendment he gave notice he should move, when the bill came up for consideration.

The morning business being disposed of, the CHAIR announced the private orders.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said with $600,000 worth of protested drafts upon the Quartermaster's Department, now under protest, he must ask the House to go on with the public business.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio hoped the gentleman would not insist upon any motion to that effect, as it was several weeks since the private calendar had been touched.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was compelled to do so under the circumstances he had stated.

Mr. BOON, on leave, made a statement. He said that, at the request of several gentlemen who wished to vote on the resolution offered by him some days since, he should not submit it again to-day, but gave notice that he should do so to-morrow morning.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then submitted his motion to proceed with the public business; but it was disagreed to.

Mr. C. then gave notice that he should, on Monday, after the presentation of petitions, move the House to take up the public business.

The private orders were then taken.

The Senate bill to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to issue a patent to Angier March Perkins and John Howard Kyan was resumed, the question being on its third reading,

The bill was discussed at great length by Messrs. LEGARE, CUSHING, MERCER, MENEFEE, HOWARD, TOLAND, TAYLOR, CRAIG, SERGEANT, CAMBRELENG, TOUCEY, WHITTLESEY, ROBERTSON, and FLETCHER of Vermont.

After which, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR of New York, the bill was recommitted to the committee which reported it, with instructions to report the reasons on which the report was founded.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. ATHERTON in the chair, for the consideration of private bills; when the following bills were taken up and considered:

A bill for the relief of the administrator of Wharton Quarles, deceased.

A bill for the relief of John Barnes.

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Carter.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of William T. Smith.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Thomas Sumpter.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Thomas Jett.

A bill for the relief of Crawford Johnson.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Timothy Feely.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Dr. Wm. Johonnot.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Col. Anthony Walton White.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Col. Willis Reddick.

A bill for the relief of the heirs of William Vauter.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of John B. Ashe.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of John Jordan.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Nathaniel Irish.

A bill for the relief of James Witherell.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Samuel Jones.

A bill for the relief of Joseph Nourse.

A bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard, and others.

A bill for the relief of the representatives of Nathaniel Tracy, and representatives of Thomas Gordon.

The committee then rose and reported.

The bills for the relief of James Witherall, for the relief of the representatives of John Jordan, and the relief of the administrator of Wharton Quarles deceased, were reported without amendment, and severally ordered to a third reading.

On the bills for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard, of Joseph Nourse, for the relief of the representatives of Colonel William Reddick, and for the relief of Nathaniel Tracy, the committee had leave to sit again.

The remainder were reported severally, with an amendment to each, striking out the allowance for commutation interest pro forma, in order to settle the principle in the House, as before, and were all postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. KILGORE, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from North Union, via Leavitt, Dallas to Waynesburg, Ohio.

On motion, at 5 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, May 18, 1838.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes, to meet the current expenses of the Government

Mr. CLAY of Ky. observed that this bill came to the Senate yesterday after 12 o'clock, referred to the Committee of Finance, and reported back by them in the course of the afternoon. He wanted to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether they had authority from the Senate to meet while the Senate was in session. He was aware that it had been the custom of the standing committees of this body to act on bills that were not deemed of any great importance during the Senate's hours of business, but he thought that a bill of the importance like this ought to be examined in a different manner.

Mr. WRIGHT would answer the Senator by saying that no authority was given by the Senate to the committee to meet during the session of that day, nor did any member of the committee leave the chamber to his knowledge. The bill was submitted to each member of the committee in his place, three of whom concurred with him in favor of, and in reporting, the bill without amendment; the others, authorizing the report, though dissenting from the bill. This was the action of the committee as far as he knew. Whether it was irregular or not, he did not know, but it had been frequently practised in that body, particularly with regard to appropriation bills.

Mr. WEBSTER said he did not expect to be called on to vote for the engrossment of this bill at so early a period after its reception from the other branch. Scarcely twenty-four hours had elapsed, and yet the question on ordering the bill to its third reading was called for. Before he gave his vote, he proposed to say a few words in relation to the subject. He begged leave to disclaim any disposition to thwart the measures necessary to carry on the Government, and desired that it might be distinctly understood that he wished the Government aided in carrying on all the great works of internal improvement, such as roads, harbors, etc. in which it was engaged. Mr. W. was of opinion, however, that there were other modes of raising means that might be resorted to less objectionable than that proposed by the bill before them. At the last extra session he had voted for the issue of ten millions in Treasury notes, and he did not regret it, because, at that time, he considered it necessary to provide present relief. Congress had been called together by the President in a case of great and extraordinary emergency; and yet some of the most distinguished friends of the Administration had avowed their determination never to vote for another issue of these notes. One great objection he had to this money was, that it was continually falling below par, and the Government, therefore, instead of paying its agents and public servants in the constitutional currency of the country, would be paying them in depreciated paper. Another objection presented itself to his mind; which was, that it was bad policy to get into the habit of raising money by such means. There was now no exigency, no very particular emergency; at all events, it had not been made to appear that there was an emergency to justify such a step. Congress had already been in session five good months, and yet we had heard nothing of such a crisis in the affairs of the Treasury. In fact, there could be no crisis now which a vigilant, systematic, and prudent, officer would not have earlier foreseen. Mr. W. contended that the bill was defective, inasmuch as it did not renew the penalties, and neither did it impose the same duties on collectors, &c. as in the former bill; and he contended that if the money were so much wanted, the proper mode to raise it would be by loan, and not by the issue of paper money, which would act with inequality, inasmuch as it fluctuated in value. He was against the practice of paying paper money by the Government. It was not a legal tender; and the report made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance the other day against paper, contained, also, unanswerable arguments against the adoption of this bill; and, so far as he was concerned, he could have wished thirty thousand copies more had been printed. Mr. W. said that unless the money was offered in one hand, and the paper in the other, these notes were, to all intents and purposes, a forced payment. Mr. W. moved to amend the bill by limiting the issue to two millions of dollars, to meet such bills as might be immediately due.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that he should endeavor, so far as was in his power, to discharge what was his duty in regard to this bill, without protracting debate.

Still some portion of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts seemed entitled to some attention. One was his commendation of the sound and valuable principle of paying the public creditor in what was equivalent to specie, and he was gratified to find that the Senator would go with him in favor of the principle that was not less valuable, that of preserving the faith of the Government. The report of his [Mr. W.] to which the Senator alluded, was an argument to show that it was highly improper for this Government to make tender in payment of its debts of the paper of local corporations; and he confessed that to some extent that argument might be applied to paper issued upon the authority, faith, and credit of the Government itself. He was among that class, who, if it were not necessary for the operations of the Treasury itself, would not adopt even that expedient. So much for that. Then the gentleman would ask him, why did he urge this bill? He answered, because he believed the necessity existed for it. We are told by the Head of the Treasury Department that even in means of this character the Treasury is so limited that it is in danger from day to day of being compelled to turn its creditors from the door. The public funds of other descriptions are postponed, and placed beyond the reach of the Treasury, by law, and the want of authority to reissue the Treasury notes puts it out of the power of the Secretary to offer payment even in this description of funds.

The gentleman had contended that there was no eminent necessity for passing this bill. Would the gentleman tell him why there was not? He says the Senate, so far as it is concerned, has given authority to sell the bonds of the Bank of the United States. He, Mr. W. remembered that the only voice raised against that measure was that of the Senator himself, on the ground that we could not sell these bonds upon the terms prescribed, in this country, and that there was not time to send them abroad for sale. He, Mr. W. felt the force of that suggestion, and submitted to the Senator that it would be necessary for Congress to provide sufficient means for the wants of the Government, by authorizing an issue of Treasury notes, or by a loan, and added that, if the bonds did sell, it would supersede the issue of Treasury notes to the amount they might sell for.

We have been told that the bill before us is not broad enough to accomplish its object. He [Mr. W.] did not apprehend any difficulty on that score. But he spoke with great distrust of his own judgment, as to construction of law, when the distinguished authority of the Senator was against him. He found, however, the bill to read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions contained in, and subject to all the conditions, limitations, and restrictions of an act, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the Treasury and cancelled.

Now, as far as his comprehension extended, the clause just read brings the whole of the act of the extra session forward, and makes it applicable to this bill. Would it be pretended that under this law a note could be issued bearing more than six per cent. interest?

Mr. WEBSTER. No.

Mr. WRIGHT. Would it be pretended that they could issue more than ten millions?

Mr. WEBSTER. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT here read from the bill, to show that notes can only be issued in place of those that came in.

Again: the notes issued under the authority of this law are made receivable in payment of all dues to the Government. Was there any doubt of this?

Mr. WEBSTER. No.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then it appears that, with one exception, all the substantive provisions of the law of the extra session are made applicable to this, except the penal enactments. As a lawyer, he should as confidently say that these enactments were brought forward as the others. But this was not material. I find, said he, that, as far as the action of the Senate is concerned, the case is already provided for, independently, by a bill just passed to punish the counterfeiting of these notes, and by a general law of Congress in relation to the punishment of crimes, passed in 1825, enumerating the counterfeiting of Treasury notes as one of the crimes to be punished. That law was yet in force. Again: at the present session the Judiciary Committee have provided for a supposed casus omissus found in both laws, which was, that there was no provision made to punish persons who should have in their possession counterfeit Treasury notes with intent to pass them. The Senate had passed this bill and sent it to the other House, so that the criminal provisions, as far as this body is concerned, are complete, without reference to this bill, or the law of October.

But the Senator suggests that there are no statements, and that, therefore, we do not know that the Treasury needs this supply. Could this be said after what had passed here within the last few days, and yet perhaps this body had been made to know less upon the subject than it ought, as most of the communications had been transmitted to the House? But his memory told him that the wants of the Treasury were so imperious as to require a special communication from the President of the United States; that that communication was made to both Houses, and was accompanied by one from the Secretary of the Treasury; that that message recommended this mode of providing for the exigency, and it seemed to him emphatically to be the correct one. Did any member of that body believe that the Treasury was not in immediate want? His information, as late as yesterday morning, was that there were but $50,000 of Treasury notes, authorized by the act of October, that remained to be issued; and that there were but some $200,000 in the Treasury scattered over the whole country. Could there be any doubt then as to the immediate and pressing necessity for passing this bill? Why, asked Mr. W. are we brought to this state of things? The Senator told us that, after passing the law of October, it was understood that one of this character would not be called for again. But the Senator did not recollect the change that was given to that act in the House of Representatives. It passed this House without any provision as to a reissue of the notes, but it came back from the House with an interdiction on such reissue; and he, Mr. W. remembered well, in moving for a concurrence with this amendment, that he said that the bill thus amended would answer till the next session of Congress, when further provision could be made, if necessary. By making these notes receivable for the dues of the Government, nearly six of the ten millions had been redeemed, and all our revenue coming in comes in that paper. The revenue is as large as was anticipated, but there was no money coming in; and, though they had issued ten millions of paper within $50,000, they were now but four millions in debt, the balance of the notes having been already redeemed and cancelled. It was not by this bill that they were incurring one dollar more of debt than was authorized by the act of October last. This bill did not authorize the reissue of a single note which has not been cancelled under that act. He would make a single remark more, which he hoped would be the last. We have been told of the depreciated character of this paper. He believed that some of the prices current had put it below bank paper, though that was at one single point of the Union only, New York; but it was now quoted there and at Philadelphia, three or four per cent. higher than that paper (United States Bank notes) which is held in such high estimation by the gentleman and his friends. His information told him that Treasury notes were higher at the South than any bank paper. In Philadelphia it was also higher, though in New York it might be quoted a trifle lower. That, however, was not the point. The question was, what were they to do? We cannot, by our fiat here, place money in the Treasury at a moment's warning. Then can we do any thing better than to give to the creditors of the Government the best paper in our power—that issued upon the faith and credit of the Government itself? The limitation proposed by the Senator's amendment would not answer. Who could tell how soon it would come back again? and how long would two millions last, when in the single port of New York it comes in at the rate of $300,000 per week? How long would it be before the Secretary of the Treasury would be compelled to come before Congress with another statement showing a deficiency of means? What danger could there be in issuing this amount? Would it run the Government in debt a dollar beyond the amount authorized by the act of October last? Not one dollar.

Mr. WEBSTER said the candor of the honorable gentleman has put this bill on the ground which expresses the different opinions between him and myself exactly; and I am desirous that it should be understood that what he says in favor of Government paper money goes to make it, on the whole, but little better than the bad money of broken banks. The Senator says it is at least as good as theirs, which is twenty or twenty-five per cent. below par. Have we contracted with our army, our navy, and the judges of our courts, to pay them in something but a little better than the depreciated paper of the banks? Was that our contract? No, sir, it was very different.

We have heard much said about the paper party, the advocates of a paper system, and a paper Government. Let us see who they are. I insist that the mouth of the Administration is shut on this subject; for all they propose to pay out is not gold and silver; and if we cannot pay our own debts in specie, or its equivalent, how can we demand it of others? What is the argument of the honorable chairman of the committee, but an acknowledgment that we cannot pay our debts? He asks what can be done? Sir, I will tell him. If Treasury notes are issued, all bearing an interest of five or six per cent. and sold to supply us with the means of paying what is due from the Government, our credit and punctuality will be sustained. He proposes that they shall not be payable under a year. Let us issue them so, bearing an interest of five or six per cent. and sell them in the market, and in two hours the Government will be able to meet the demands upon it. Why should this not be done? Sir, I put the question to Congress and to the country. They may not sell at par, but why not sell them notwithstanding? If it is not done, the Government cannot properly pay its debts; and who, in that case, is to bear the misfortune—the Government itself, or its individual creditors? The Senator is averse to this method, because there is an exigency in the condition of the Government, and it cannot pay its debts without a sacrifice. Is this the language of individuals? If there must be a loss in the payment of a debt, on whom is it to fall? Does an individual say he would have to sell his property cheap, and, therefore, he cannot pay? Sir, there is no difficulty in the way to prevent the Government from doing as I have proposed, to maintain the credit and good faith of the country; there is nothing to prevent our selling our own notes, and thus raising the money, and paying according to contract. The Senator himself admits that the method proposed amounts very nearly to a forced payment; and, sir, I say again, that what we now propose to offer as an option to our creditors is of less value, the country through, than the payment which the Senator opposes in his report, because on that the creditor can receive the specie if he prefers it; for, in the terms of the proposition, the specie is paid and payable on demand. But this Government paper is not at all of that character; it is payable only at a distant day, or in dues to the Government. I say, then, that, on the ground that it is only a little depreciated, it is as much against the principle as if it were reduced to fifty per cent. The man is entitled to the whole, and we, as his debtor, are not doing our duty unless we pay him the whole. We all know that this paper will not be at par with gold and silver at any point in the Union at any time, and, therefore, we should not sanction the principle of offering paper which we know is not at par, and, therefore, is no substantial option; the Senators themselves are the judges that there is no substantial option. We, therefore, force on our creditors something of less value than lawful money.

This bill, I am of the opinion, will not have the effect to revive all the act of October last. All that relates to the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury is duly provided for; but this bill does not revive the third section of the law of October, relating to the collector, his deposites, and receipts, and all that; and I say that it does not revive the penal part of that law. The Senator speaks of the law of 1825 as supplying this deficiency, but in the bill of the last session he thought the penal provision necessary, and I had supposed that the law of 1825 did not cover exchequer bills subsequent to that period. If the Senator means to say that this bill does not revive those provisions, then I say that it does not accomplish its object in that respect.

Sir, what is the state of the case? The four or five millions of dollars of Treasury notes are now outstanding. The gentleman says that they are all received for the customs and at the land offices, and therefore the Government gets no money. Is it not the reason of the distribution of these Treasury notes that they are to serve the same purpose as to get the money? These reports show that we have a Government currency, and have not any thing in the Treasury but this depreciated paper, and that is a state of things which I will not agree to encourage. I am opposed now, and always have been, to all introduction of paper money as a depreciated currency for the Treasury, and I ask again, if we cannot pay our own dues at par, who can? It is time for us to stop the outcry against depreciated paper, when we, with our eyes open, authorize what amounts to a compulsory payment of our creditors with something of less value than lawful money.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had not heard, during the whole session, a stronger argument in favor of the policy, that the Government should keep its own funds, and collect them in the legal and constitutional currency of the country, than that just delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] He entirely concurred with him that it is bound to pay its creditors in the legal currency, and the importance of preserving the public faith from the slightest blot. But to accomplish this, the Government must always be kept in a condition to meet its engagements, and how could this be done, but by collecting its dues in the legal currency, and keeping it in its own custody? This was the only possible manner, and yet this is neither more less than the odious Sub-Treasury, which the Senator is in the daily habit of denouncing so violently!

But while he tells us that the Government is bound to pay in gold and silver, and that nothing short of that can preserve the public faith immaculate, he is the strenuous advocate of collecting its dues in bank notes or their equivalent. The fallacy consists in supposing that such notes are equivalent to specie. There is nothing equivalent to gold and silver but themselves. Nothing else can legally pay debts, or release the debtor from his obligation to his creditor. This the Senator asserts, and insists on most correctly. How then can bank notes be equivalent, unless they can always command, without the possibility of failure, the amount of gold or silver that they call for? Is such the fact? Is it the case now? On the contrary, is it not notorious that the Government has millions of bank notes collected, when the banks that issued them were specie-paying banks, but which cannot now command a cent in specie? And is it not now compelled to dishonor its credit, and violate its faith, because it collected its dues in bank notes, and confided the safe keeping of its funds to the banks? And yet while the Senator denounces this want of ability on the part of the Government, he is the strenuous advocate to renew its connection with the banks, under the fallacious idea that bank notes and bank credit are equivalent to specie, doing; in a word, the very thing again which has subjected the Government to the necessity which he so strongly condemns! Worse than this: he proposes to repeat the process, when it is admitted by his colleague, [Mr. DAVIS,] and his distinguished friend behind him, [Mr. CLAY,] that the renewal of the connection must again be followed in a short time by another explosion, when again the Government would be compelled to do what the Senator so justly and strongly condemns! He was at a loss to understand how the Senator could reconcile the conflict between his sentiments and the course he advocated. It seemed to him, that as the zealous supporter of the good faith of the Government, he ought to be the warmest advocate of the only mode of collecting and keeping the public money by which it could be preserved.

The Senator, in his zeal to preserve the public faith, recommended that the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by this bill, should be made to bear an interest of 6 per cent. and be sold for money instead of being paid to the public creditors. He did not explain what he meant by money. If he means gold and silver, does he not see how greatly it would impede and embarrass the resumption of specie payments, for the Government to go into the market, and draw out at once eight or ten millions of specie? Would he recommend that at this critical moment, when the banks were about to resume? If he means bank notes, then it was neither more nor less than to advise the Government to exchange its credit for the credit of the banks of New York and Boston, (the only specie payments at this moment,) and give them 6 per cent. to boot, when it was notorious that Treasury notes were at par in both those places, and would be better over the whole South and West than the very notes for which he proposes to exchange them! This would certainly be a very good operation for those banks, but would be a very bad one for the Government and people. The Senator has spoken of Treasury notes as being depreciated. Such was not the fact. They had been above par every where, habitually compared with the local bank notes, except during short intervals at New York; but that did not show that they were actually depreciated. We all know that the currency of New York has been in a highly artificial state, from the necessity its banks were under to resume specie payments by a certain day, or forfeit their charters. The rate of her exchanges with London clearly proves the unnatural condition of her currency. The difference in her favor was far greater than could be explained by any operation of commerce, and if he did not mistake, was greater than the depreciation of the Treasury notes, compared with her local currency, which demonstrates that they have not been depreciated at any time, compared with London, which may fairly be considered the standard of the currency of the commercial world. Though he regretted, with the Senator, that the Government had not at all times been in the condition to meet its engagements in gold and silver, it was some consolation to reflect that substantial justice had been done to its creditors, as far as it had used its own credit throughout this embarrassing and painful crisis.

The question before them was very simple. The Government was out of money, and there were but two ways of supplying the deficiency—to borrow it, or to use its own credit; and the question was which should be done? The Senator objected strongly to the latter, but he could not possibly be more opposed to it than he [Mr. C.] was to the former. It is useless to attempt disguise. Those who advocate a loan, mean to force the Government to exchange its credit for that of the banks. There is no one so crazy as to believe that a loan ought to be made in gold and silver. Now what have we daily heard for the last six months, from those who are now so strenuous for a loan, but that the credit of the Government was so essential to the banks, that if it was withdrawn, the whole system would fall prostrate; and yet they now ask the Government to exchange its better credit for the very credit that it sustains, and give six per cent to boot! What would be thought of an individual in private life who would commit the folly of exchanging his own promissory note for that of a neighbor, which was so inferior to his as to depend upon his endorsement for its credit, and give similar difference? He would be regarded a fit candidate for Bedlam; and yet this is exactly what those in favor of a loan wish Government to do. To give a clear conception how the blending of the credit of the Government with the banks operated, both in relation to individuals and the Government, he would illustrate his conception by a statement of a case. Take three individuals, near neighbors, and of equal wealth and credit: say three planters, each worth a hundred thousand dollars, free of debt, and of equal character for fidelity in meeting their engagements, and call them A, B, and C. It is manifest that, each being of equal credit, neither would think of exchanging his credit for either of the others, much less of paying a difference in the exchange. But let Government interfere and take up C, and confer banking privileges upon him—that is, authorize his promissory notes to be received in its dues and the purchase of its domain, and give him the use of its funds between the periods of collection and disbursements, and this equality will be destroyed. A and B would now call it an accommodation to obtain C's notes in exchange for theirs; nay, C. would disdain to exchange, unless the one should endorse for the other, and pay him six per cent. difference; and to this exaction they would be compelled to submit. A, for instance, wishes to settle a son in the West; and for the purpose of purchasing land from the Government, desires to raise ten thousand dollars. Neither his note nor B's can buy land; and to obtain the means, he is obliged to go to B, get his endorsement, which, from his perfect confidence in his neighbor, he gives for nothing, and gives his note, with the joint credit of both, in exchange for C's note, deducting nearly seven dollars in the hundred, or nearly seven hundred on the whole. His son puts the note in his pocket-book, and goes off to the West, where, through the magic of banking privileges, it is converted into solid and fertile acres. Presently the Government gets out of money; and all the friends of C (a numerous host) zealously insist that, instead of using its own notes, it should sell them to C in exchange for his, and pay the same difference; and this they call a loan—borrowing money! The thing is monstrous.

Thus regarding it, he has long considered public loans among the greatest impositions; and he was accordingly mortally opposed to a public debt. When there was a deficit, it was better by far for the Government to use its own credit directly, nor did he believe it to be impossible, if the laws which govern credit and circulation were fully understood, to supersede a resort to any other resource, without burthening the public with the heavy and pernicious load of debt, contracted for the most part by the exchange of its own credit for that of the banks, in the form of bank notes. He, for one, was not willing that his constituents should be taxed for a loan, when it could possibly be avoided; and such was his repugnance to a debt, that he could scarcely imagine the case, in peace or war, that would induce him to vote for one with his present impressions.

But if Treasury notes were really below par, as asserted by the Senator, it would not be at all surprising, and might be easily explained. Their value mainly depends on their receivability in the public dues, and it might be anticipated that the liberal indulgence given to the public debtors at the extra session would tend to depress them in the market; and it is a proof of the high estimate placed on them by the public, that they have been so little affected by the course to which he has referred. Their depression during the late war, when they sunk below the value of bank notes even during the period of the suspension of specie payments, has often been urged against their use. Nothing was more easy of explanation. The Government had the weakness and folly to permit it, by its own voluntary acts, by putting bank notes of every description on a level with Treasury notes in all its transactions, while the banks on their part refused to put them on a level with theirs in their transactions. The result was, that bank notes could perform all the functions of circulation, public and private, while Treasury notes could perform only a part. There depreciation followed as a matter of course, under the known laws that regulate circulation. If the Government had reversed its course, and refused to receive the notes of any bank that discredited its notes, or rather had refused to touch bank notes at all, its notes would have been universally and greatly preferred to those of the banks, and the war might have been carried on with vastly less embarrassment, and the saving of millions.

The use of bank credit by Government had been, in his opinion, the source of great mischief, both in this country and England. It was the parent of the enormous debt that has pressed so heavily on the energies of the latter, as great as they are. He had barely touched on a range of questions little explored as yet, but intimately connected with the progress and prosperity of the country. Whenever the elements of a true and stable currency were ascertained, he felt assured that it would be found to consist partly of gold and silver, and of paper, resting not on the credit and authority of banks, but of the Government itself.

He said, in conclusion, that he would vote for the bill with pleasure, as he believed it was necessary; but his pleasure would have been increased if the notes were to be issued without interest.

Mr. WEBSTER said: I am not at all surprised to hear the Senator from South Carolina say that he has found my argument against Treasury notes a very good one in favor of separating bank and State, for the present state of the gentleman's mind is such that he would find such an argument any where, on any subject, and on any occasion. So deeply is he immersed in this, his favorite subject, that I verily believe, if he should hear a discourse on theology, or a philosophical dissertation, he would start up and say it contained fine doctrines for divorce. But what did I say touching the doctrine of divorce? I insisted that the Government should fulfil its contracts; but what has that to do with divorce? Did I contend that the Government should pay any thing not equivalent to specie? I have never done it. It is astonishing that the gentleman should so laboriously confound things so different; and before he attempts it again, let us understand the use of terms. I contend that Treasury notes can never be at par, and by that I mean at the established rates according to law. The gentleman says they are, and have been, at par, because they are equal to par in New York. But he might as well say that broadcloth, or molasses, or any other merchandise, is at par. His proposition is that they are equal to par in New York for the London market. But what of that? I mean that they are not equivalent to gold and silver, in the currency, and according to law. His par and my par, therefore, are not the same thing. If he means to meet the question whether Treasury notes are equivalent to gold and silver as the legal standard, that is the question; but if he will not meet that question, I offer no other.

He asks, how can Government pay in what is equivalent to specie, if it pay in specie paying bank notes? It has done so for many years, and never found any difficulty in doing it, and it never will. He speaks also of our exchanging credit with the banks, and paying the difference. But this a confusion of ideas, or, at least, of terms. What does he mean by credit? If he means that the Government can contract loans on as good terms as the banks, that is not denied. But what would you call a check which is given on a bank? Is that credit? It is not credit; it is a thing entirely different. To make the two cases at all alike, the Government paper must be redeemable in specie, on demand, at the Treasury; and then, I dare say, its paper would be very good. He asks if Mr. Astor would pay a bank for its credit. Mr. Astor, and every man, however large their capital and credit, borrow money of the banks when they wish to do it, on time, because that money is payable in specie. The gentleman calls that an exchange of credit for credit. But it is no such thing. You cannot say that a note on time is equivalent to a bank note commanding the specie; they are entirely different. The gentleman says that the Government credit is the best in the world; but it is not the best in the way that the Government uses it here. If he says bank notes circulate on the credit of the Government, that does not make Government notes of this kind better than bank notes payable and paid in specie. It may do very well to help out of an emergency; but the crisis is in his argument, and the emergency in his proposition. Paper is not equivalent to specie, unless it is payable in specie.

I do not ask how it may be sold for exchange on London, but whether it will pass current as specie or as equivalent to specie. Let us try that. Will Treasury notes command the specie, at par, in any State of the Union? We all know that they will not. It is a general remark that they are under specie par; this has been admitted, and all the facts show it.

But let us look farther at what is the operation of exchanges. You may call it a transfer of bank notes. But the gentleman's suppositions are all ideal, and never take place. All great payments are made by transfers of credit, and this is the actual payment. Look at the operations of this Government. In 1816, they passed a joint resolution authorizing the collectors to receive the paper of specie-paying banks. And how did they do it? The collectors and the books of the Treasury had no separate accounts; but all was passed to the credit of the Government as specie. Look at the books for twenty years, and can you find any thing there except what is put down as specie? But the notes were not kept at all; and the gentleman's notion that we must have an armful of notes for our creditors that come here, and notes that will not at once command the specie, is going on the up-hill road, and I believe the country cannot be dragged into it. And the gentleman asks, will you sell these notes for specie? That, he thinks, would be ruinous, and for bank notes he will never sell them. He will have neither specie nor bank notes. What, then, will he do? He comes back to his project at this and the last session, of the exclusive use of paper money by the Government. He will borrow neither specie nor bank notes, but will pay out and receive Government paper as the exclusive medium. The Government must have money of its own; and, as he says, if there is an emergency, and the Government is in want of more means, what is it to do? Make more issues of paper. All this he told us before, and that the Government is to sustain it at par, for which the power of the Government is sufficient. By this he cannot mean the par of specie, but of something else; for there is no truth in the proposition as a general one, that Government credit is better than any other credit. It is convertibility which makes bank notes equivalent to specie, and it is altogether ideal that, by receiving specie-paying bank notes, we disable ourselves from paying what is equivalent to specie.

Sir, I am asked whether I would go the length of selling these Treasury notes for money, and then whether I would have it in specie. I at once say, sell them, and then every body will know that there will be a choice only between specie and something that will command specie. I say make your accounts every where in specie or its equivalent. The gentleman supposes that we are to withdraw the amount of $10,000,000 from the circulation. If we should grasp the silver and shut it up in the Treasury vaults, that would be altogether injurious, and the gentleman, therefore, uses a very good argument to-day against what he urged six months ago. He now says, if we withdraw so much specie, it would cause embarrassment; but what did he think of demanding it for revenue? He now says that this Treasury note bill is a most necessary step for all the banks. He then saw no inconvenience in demanding payment in specie; it would not embarrass the country, and was the only just mode of collecting the revenue. Let our Secretary of the Treasury be a man of just and liberal policy, addicted to no mere theories, and bound down by no party dogmas, and he will make the disposition of these notes in the market in a few days, disturbing nobody, and giving no occasion for these agitations and alarms; it is the continuing these Treasury notes, and rejecting the practice of twenty years for dreams and theories, that creates all difficulties.

But the gentleman asks, is not the Government to use its own credit? Certainly it should; and it is right that, like individuals, it should get money and pay its own debts. It should use it now; but is it a proper use of Government credit to force it, instead of the money, on its creditors? Is it justice to tell its creditors, though you prefer specie or the notes of specie-paying banks, you shall have our credit only? Like individuals, the Government should come up to the standard of the country; and, if it has not the means to pay its debts, then, like individuals, it should raise it by its credit. But it has no right to compel the creditor to receive its promise to pay, any more than individuals have the right to force on their creditors a new promise instead of paying what they owe. The gentleman calls that using credit, but it is using power, and not a use of credit.

And now to go back to his example of the three farmers, A, B, C. The gentleman supposes that the Government authorizes the receipt of the paper of C, so that he may make purchases directly of Government, which A and B cannot do without endorsed notes at interest, and he says that this is just the case with the banks. I say it is not the case, and that every idea of credit involves time and convertibility; and if it does not, it is nothing. The notes of the bank are money in effect, and to say that their paper is on time, and that there is merely an exchange of credit, is what no man can say with propriety. Suppose one of your officers in the city of New York sells a Treasury note, and he gives you a check on one of the banks paying specie, so that you can go across the street, and get it if you choose, is there any change of credit if you receive the notes of the bank, when you can go at once and get the specie? It is not an exchange of credit; it is an exchange of credit for money, if you give your note on time, for specie, or the equivalent of specie. This, Mr. Astor, or any other individual would do, if he wished to use his credit for what would give him an immediate command of specie. The terms of the gentleman, therefore, do not stand in relation to each other; they are, therefore, not just in argument. And there is no analogy between the cases to which he has applied them. In his case of the three farmers, undoubtedly the Government ought to make no discrimination; and they never should in regard to bank notes, except on the ground that they are equivalent to specie, that they are more convenient, and at the same time equal in value to specie; and if Treasury notes were so equivalent to specie, then it might be proper to place them on the same ground.

Mr. W. expressed the hope that the Senate would at an early day take into consideration the subject relating to the Treasury order. Whatever else was done or not done, that he thought ought to be rescinded. Some gentlemen thought it had done good, but could do so no longer; others thought that it had never done any good; but all concurred in the opinion that it ought to exist no longer.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would not notice the criticism with which the Senator opened his remarks, as he considered that as intended for the gallery. He had long noticed that, when hard pressed in argument, the Senator always resorted to sarcasm or ridicule; and there were few occasions in which he more needed their aid than the present. He never accused the Senator of saying that bank notes should be forced on the public creditor by the Government; on the contrary, he rested his remarks on the ground assumed by him, and which he entirely approved, that it could not, in good faith, discharge its debts in any medium but gold and silver, which he regarded as a conclusive argument why it should collect its dues in the legal currency, and keep its own funds under its own custody, that it might always be in the condition to preserve its credit. On the contrary, the Senator was in favor of receiving the notes of specie-paying banks, on the ground that they were equivalent to gold and silver. Here lies the delusion of the Senator. To be equivalent is to be equal in all respects; and yet, while the Senator confesses that they are not equal in the discharge of the debts due from the Government, he holds them to be equal in the payment of debts to it. He would ask him why they should be equivalent in the one case and not the other, and how the Government can possibly preserve its faith, if it cannot pay away that which it may receive?

The truth is, that it is a pure fiction to consider bank notes as equivalents to specie; and it illy becomes him who falls into one so gross to talk of the visionary theories of others.

But the Senator has gone a step farther. He says that bank notes are not credit, and do not rest on credit! Not credit! They must then be actual specie, or at least identical with it in every respect; and to this conclusion he must come to reconcile his course with the sentiments he has expressed. He would not waste his breath in dispelling so wild and strange a delusion, which all around us proclaim to be the merest phantom. So far from being specie, representing specie, or resting on specie, or being necessarily converted into specie on demand, they are nothing but credit, credit, credit, throughout.

Since the days of the deposite Bank of Amsterdam, bank notes never have represented specie. The first act of a bank, even when specie was actually paid in, which was rarely the case, was to get clear of it, except a small portion, by lending it out. The real bank capital, on which they mainly did business, was the notes discounted, which rested on the credit of the drawers and endorsers, and on their credit and solvency depended the credit and solvency of the banks. It was, in fact, their credit, converted into bank notes, and backed by the Government credit on which bank currency rested; and yet it is this, which rests on credit, piled on credit, and composed in all of its elements of credit, which the Senator denies to be credit, and considers as nothing less than the actual specie itself.

The Senator seems to think that it is impossible to bring and keep Treasury notes at par with gold and silver. In reply, he would refer to the fact already mentioned. It appeared by the Intelligencer, now on his table, that they are now at par with specie at New York. But he had a much stronger fact. The Prussian Government, which he regarded as the best administered at present in Europe, had a permanent issue of Treasury notes of a large amount, which were not only at par with specie, but habitually bore a premium; which completely refutes the assertion of the Senator. He made the statement on unquestionable authority—the highly intelligent and respectable representative of that Government to ours. There was no mystery about the matter. The Government, in all civilized countries, is the great money dealer. Its fiscal action pervades the whole community, and affects, more or less, every individual in it, and it must, of course, create a general demand for whatever it receives and disburses as money in the management of its fiscal concerns. To this our Government adds the possession of a boundless and fertile domain, which is in the course of rapid settlement, and that necessarily creates an extensive demand for whatever is received in payment for it. It is these demands which will ever keep Treasury notes at par value, unless the due proportion between demand and supply should be transcended, or bank notes, or some other medium other than gold and silver, be permitted to supply their place. It is the same relation between demand and supply, and not their convertibility, which mainly sustains the value of bank notes.

The debts due to all banks fairly conducted are greater than those due from them, and, of course, their demand for their own paper, when the quantity issued is not excessive, must keep up its value so long as their debtors are solvent, as between them and the banks it is equal to specie. There is this difference between the two: that the demand of the Government is far more universal, and may be rendered more steady, which gives it a decided superiority over the credit of the banks. Thus regarding the two, he did not doubt it was much safer and wiser for the Government to use its own credit in the collection and distribution of its revenue, as far as it might be convenient, or to meet a temporary deficiency in the revenue, like the present, than to use bank notes, or resort to a loan. He did not wish to be understood as going further.

There was no contradiction between his course now and formerly, as the Senator supposed. He never doubted that the demand of the Government for gold and silver to pay its dues, would more or less disturb the process of resumption, but not to the extent for which he and others, who thought with him, contended, while he regarded the good to be attained as infinitely outweighing the evil.

It is not difficult to see, why the advocates of the banks should be so much in favor of a loan. It is a very profitable transaction to those institutions to exchange credit with Government, and receive nearly seven per cent. to boot, getting at the same time a better credit than their own.

Mr. C. concluded in showing that the Senator had not met the case he stated of A, B, and C, which Mr. C. restated, and further illustrated; and said that he would be glad to hear any one fairly state, and attempt to answer it.

Mr. WEBSTER said he did not wish to resume the discussion on the Sub-Treasury, but he would say a few words in explanation; and I wish it, said he, always to be understood that, when I insisted that the Government should pay in specie, I always added, "or the equivalent of specie," because specie-paying bank notes are equivalent to specie. Under the resolution of 1816, every thing was passed to the credit of the United States as cash. And why did we allow the payment of specie-paying bank notes? It was for the sake of convenience. But it was not said that they would not be subject to loss. It was not on account of their absolute security, but of their convenience, that the joint resolution of 1816 was adopted. There was danger of loss, or at least no absolute security; and the same may be said of specie itself, for that may be counterfeited. My argument was this: that the paper of specie-paying banks was received and paid, valuing it as a constant equivalent to specie; and this is founded on the fact that specie-paying bank paper is the representative of specie, having that which it represents always at command. The fact is known to be that the paper of such banks does pass as specie, and the Government adopted it on that ground, and that was all I said.

But I am glad of one thing: that the gentleman does not deny what I said in respect to his being in favor of a Government paper currency; but, on the contrary, has confirmed it. If this is not the tendency of the doctrine of State rights, it is the result of the doctrine of him and his friends; all tends to a Government paper, a Government bank. He has said nothing to show that I misrepresented him in this respect. He is for a Government paper, and I go against it. I am but for one standard, and that is the standard of the community.

The gentleman says that my argument carries contradiction in it. If it is in opposition to any other argument of mine, that might be shown. But, as he was rather indefinite, he may say that it is opposed to my course. [It was opposed to an inference of Mr. CALHOUN.] But what has been my course, and what opinion have I ever expressed, or what vote have I given, inconsistent with what I have expressed to-day? I do not see that Government pays in specie any the less because it uses the agency of the banks. For twenty years we have paid in specie, or its equivalent, and have used the banks as our agents, and we use them now. The gentleman says he will have nothing to do with bank paper. But what says the Secretary of the Treasury? Does he not say that he will receive bank notes; and has it not been proclaimed as a great merit in the Administration that they do receive them? Does the gentleman suppose that specie is now paid on goods imported? I understand just the reverse, and that the merchant's check is received for his bond; and this is justly considered as equivalent to specie. Therefore, if these Treasury notes were sold in New York, the merchant would give his check for them.

The gentleman seems to complain that I did not answer his case of A, B, C. It was thus, as I understood it: He supposed three farmers of equal credit, but the Government says it will receive the paper of C. If that were the case, I should say it would be a very foolish and unequal law. But if he had put in the case of C that his paper was convertible, on demand, to specie, and that the paper of the other two was not, he would then have a parallel case, and it might be an advantage to C to give his paper this respectability. But that is not the object. The great object of the Government is, and ought to be, the accommodation of the public; and, if there is an incidental benefit, that can be no objection, but a recommendation. But the object is to accommodate the public and the Government.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he wished to be distinctly understood, that he did not carry his ideas of the Government using its own credit beyond the temporary wants of the Treasury, and the conveniest management of its fiscal concerns.

If he did not censure the Administration for receiving the notes of specie-paying banks, it was because he believed that the laws left no discretion; but, with his opinion, if he were the Chief Magistrate, and believed that he had a discretion whether to receive such notes or not, he would not permit a dollar of bank paper to be received. There was a heavy responsibility somewhere. We are renewing our connection with the banks, when it was admitted that a shock must again follow at no distant day, unless some measure was adopted to prevent it. He hoped gentlemen would bring forward their plans for preventing it, so that they might be duly considered. He, on his part, regarded the separation as the most safe and simple that could be adopted, and trusted that it would not be surrendered, unless some other more eligible could be devised, of which, however, he had no hope.

Mr. PRESTON argued at length against the adoption of the bill. He would give his assent in no shape or form to the establishment of the repudiated and continental system of paper money. He should meet the crisis boldly, and not seek to hide the matter under the garb of a re-issue of Treasury notes. This bankrupt state of the Treasury must have been known, or at least foreseen. The sales of the public lands had almost entirely ceased; the revenue from the customs was dried up. Why, then, were the States not called on for the restoration of the deposites? He would answer, that the people might not have their eyes opened to scrutinise the conduct of the present Administration; that Administration which had promised so much in the way of trenchment and reform, and done so little! That explained the partiality for Treasury issues, that splendid financial operation, which made money for the Government by the skill of the engraver; the object of which was to conceal from the people the state of embarrassment which misrule had brought upon them. We were told last session that it was a case of great emergency and pressing distress. Give us an issue of ten millions, that shall be the last you will ever hear of it, and yet in the space of a few short months we are called on for ten millions more. It would appear that when we got out of money, all we had to do was to send to New York; a little steel, and copper, and ink, were the only ingredients necessary for the issue, as the people had already forgotten the Commonwealth paper of the Revolution and the assignats of France. What was the object of all this, but to bring the people by degrees to the adoption of a Treasury Bank. Mr. P. denied the constitutional right of Congress to issue bills of credit, and for so high a right as that he would claim the express power; we had the right to tax, and to borrow, and the enumeration of these powers showed clearly that the right to issue bills of credit was not in the grant. Mr. P. then read an amendment which he had prepared, calling on the States for the amount of the surplus fund deposited with them, in the proportions, and at the dates, prescribed by the deposite act; but which, he said, he would not offer at the present time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN opposed the bill on the ground that this mode of raising money led to extravagant issues, and therefore ought to be discouraged. In three years this Administration, with the cry of retrenchment and reform, had spent one hundred millions of dollars, and now gave out an "emergency." If this were to continue, and the people called on for ten millions every few months, the sooner the Administration was in the bills of mortality the better! Nothing could cure it but keeping it from the money. Mr. C. continued his remarks to some length, and announced his intention of voting for the amendment, because the more limited the grants of money the better.

Mr. BROWN, before the question was taken, wished to make a few observations; and he promised the Senate that he would detain them for a very few minutes. But for some remarks which had fallen from the two gentlemen who had addressed the Senate on the other side, and for some errors in point of fact which had escaped them, leaving him in no surprise at the conclusions to which they had arrived, he would not, at this late period of the day, have trespassed on the indulgence of the Senate. In the first place, the Senator from Massachusetts spoke of the depreciated condition of Treasury notes, and contrasted them with the notes of the banks, greatly to the advantage of the latter. One of the arguments of that gentleman, predicated on this assumption, was, that Treasury notes should not be offered to the creditors of the Government, but that they should, at all times, have the option of receiving gold and silver, or their equivalents. Another honorable gentleman, distinguished in the ranks of the Opposition, took occasion the other day to say, that the notes of the Government were inferior in value to those of the Bank of the United States. Now he [Mr. B.] happened to have in his possession a statement, which conclusively established the contrary. He saw in the prices current of New York, dated the 15th of this month, that they had sold at par in the notes of banks which were redeemed in specie; and, therefore, they were equivalent to specie.

At the very time that the gentleman uttered the remark that the Treasury notes were inferior to those of the Bank of the United States, the latter were four or five per cent. below par, when the former were above, or equal to it. He found, also, by the same paper, that in the city of Philadelphia, Treasury notes sold at 2½ per cent. advance. Now there was that difference between the current notes of Philadelphia and specie; and therefore, at that place, the Treasury notes were equal to specie. He was astonished at the boldness with which gentlemen for some time past had made in their places similar declarations. He took the occasion to say that these errors and misrepresentations were of a piece with many others that daily went out from this body. One of the great objects of a certain political party seemed to be to assault and destroy the credit and character of the Government of the United States; and while they did that, they, in the same breath, sought to elevate the credit and character of the Bank of the United States. Such assaults were not only against the credit and character of the Government of the United States, but they were against the honor and character of the people of the United States; for the people and the Government were identified, both in credit and in character; and their pecuniary and political interests were indissolubly connected together. Notwithstanding the acknowledged truth of this axiom, we have heard gentlemen from day to day endeavoring to bring down the credit of the Government of their country below that of the most corrupt banking corporations; and yet they would talk of their patriotism! Patriotism! Why, it was said that the Devil could quote scripture, when it suited his purposes to do so.

No man was more averse to an extravagant expenditure of the public money than he was. He was one of that school, who believed that a rigid and judicious economy, in the management of the public finances, was essential to the preservation of our institutions in their original purity; and he would be the last man to sanction a resort to the credit of the Government for the encouragement of waste or extravagance. But the Government was embarrassed, and that embarrassment was brought about not by its own acts, but by a great moneyed power, acting in concert with a certain political party, whose only hopes of success rested in destroying the credit of the Government, and drying up the resources and commerce of their country. It was one of a series of actions, put into operation for several years past, to arrest the financial operations of the Government, for the purpose of forcing the people into the measures of a banking corporation. It was shamelessly avowed by its organ, that it was in vain to reason with the people, and that they never would be brought to their senses until they were brought to them by severe distress. Sir, said Mr. B. I believe that the great object of that power has been, and is, to produce that distress, for the purpose of bringing the people, as they say, to their senses; or, in other words, to bring them bound hand and foot to its footstool. This haughty moneyed power has not only carried on its designs against the citizens of the country in their pecuniary and commercial relations, but now ascends a step higher, and dares to wrestle with the Government of the people's choice, striving to arrest its fiscal operations, for the purpose of bringing the "stupid" people to their senses. Should that object be accomplished, then those political prophets who have been exulting for years in the embarrassments they have thrown in the way of the Government, will triumphantly say: "Your Government can only get on by the aid of a Bank of the United States."

Mr. B. here took occasion to refer to the course of the Federal party during the late war with Great Britain, in availing themselves of all the means in their power to embarrass the operations of the Government, and to bring its arms and its credit into disrepute, by refusing necessary supplies, which he likened to the course of the Opposition at this time, reckless of the honor and interests of their country, and willing to sacrifice all in the eager pursuit of political power. What was the course of the Federalists, he asked, in that war? During its whole continuance they were constantly endeavoring to harrass the Government, to cripple its resources, discredit its arms, and to bring it to propose an inglorious peace; but people, whom they now profess to be so anxious to bring to their senses, were not quite so lost to national honor as to sustain them; but, with patriotic devotion, they stood by their country, as he trusted and believed that they would now, and that country came out of the contest with increased strength and renovated glory. He could not but admire the patriotic and noble sentiment which was uttered by one of our gallant defenders during that memorable contest. "I am for my country," said he, "right or wrong." He had no difficulty in believing that there was a systematic endeavor to prostrate the credit of the country, and to bring it to the feet of a great political party and a great moneyed corporation, as was then, by the same means, attempted to bring it to the feet of a foreign power. In this posture of affairs, he was, like the gallant officer whose language he had quoted, for sustaining his country at all hazards; he would say, "millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute." He had heard it proclaimed, in the course of this debate, that the Government of the United States was bankrupt and insolvent. It mortified him more than he had language to express, to hear such sentiments as these uttered by an American statesman. What! this Government, richer, and in better condition in its fiscal resources, than any Government on earth, bankrupt! The idea, absurd and ridiculous as it was, was calculated to disgrace us abroad. It was an insult, not on the Administration, but on the country at large—on the whole people of the United States. To say that this Government, which but represents the wealth and intelligence of the people of the United States, and in which great concern they are the stockholders, is bankrupt, was an assault on the national credit and character. If the merest pettifogger in the humblest county court in the Union were to get up and make the assertion, in a legal argument, that the wealthiest citizen of the county was insolvent, because he could not pay every dollar he owed at a moment's warning, he would be scouted at. He knew that honorable gentlemen, who had read something of the law-merchant in Blackstone's Commentaries, unlike statesmen of enlarged and liberal views, endeavored to assimilate this Government to a bankrupt, technically made so, by force of law. But the merest pettifogger in our courts would be scouted for drawing such a parallel. He had asserted that there was no Government in the world whose fiscal resources were in so good a condition as those of the United States. Let gentlemen look to England—one of the freest Governments, in their estimation, in Europe. That Government, so lauded by the Opposition for its paper system and freedom, had her thousand millions of public debt; while we, who merely contemplated a loan of only ten millions, were taunted with being bankrupt. If gentlemen were disposed to go into figures and calculations, let us see how matters stood with the Administration which preceded the late one, and which was expelled from power by the people's voice. The national debt, under that Administration, was forty or fifty millions, though they did not create it. The national debt under this and the act of October could not exceed ten millions altogether, and if the Government had its available means, it could at once pay it off. But the Government had been deprived of its resources, by the votes of the very gentlemen who now taunt it with bankruptcy, and they were, therefore, bound, by every moral and political principle, to provide for the deficiency. In the first place, they voted for the Distribution act, with others, which was the principal cause which occasioned the present wants of the Treasury. He himself had approved it, believing it to be his duty to restore to the people what had been taken from them by unjust taxation; but gentlemen in the Opposition voted for it, who were governed by no such motives; for they had fastened on the country that odious system of taxation, by means of which the surplus had accumulated. Gentlemen in the Opposition also voted with the friends of the Administration, to relieve the merchants who were suffering under the effects of the explosion, by an extension of their duty bonds, thus placing three or four millions more out of the Treasury; and by voting to relieve the banks, by giving them a long credit on the Government money they had so lawlessly detained, they placed out of the Treasury near six millions more. Thus gentlemen, by whose votes near forty millions have been put out of the Treasury, now contend that the Government is bankrupt! He contended that every moral obligation, every principle of justice and patriotism, demanded of these gentlemen to supply the Government which they had stripped of its resources. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] asked why they did not establish a system of direct taxation? and why not call upon the States to refund the money that had been deposited with them? If the gentleman was so solicitous for these measures, why did he not propose them himself? Why not propose a measure for the appointment of a host of officers to collect the direct taxes? Did not the gentleman profess the greatest reverence and respect for economy? And what economy could there be in collecting direct taxes? He believed that the ablest financiers estimated that, by the best mode that could be devised of collecting direct taxes, the expense would not be less than 25 per cent.; while the expense of supplying the Treasury in the mode proposed, would be very inconsiderable. Was the gentleman prepared for calling on the States for the money deposited with them under the distribution act, or was his project merely held out ad captandum? If he was in earnest, let him bring forward his proposition?

But it seemed that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had made a new discovery. He had discovered that the measure now proposed was unconstitutional; that the Government had no right to make use of its credit by an issue of Treasury notes. This he asserted in the face of the long continued practice of the Government during the last war; and in the very face of the Constitution itself, which gave Congress the power to borrow money, and the power to punish the counterfeiting of the securities of the United States. But he would give the gentleman, in answer to his objections, his own argument, and he wanted no better for the purpose. The gentleman strenuously insisted that, if the Government was in want of money, it should raise it by a loan, instead of by the means provided in this bill which he deemed so objectionable; and in the very next breath he told us that the issuing these Treasury notes would be "a loan to all intents and purposes." Now, sir, said Mr. B. if it is a loan to all intents and purposes, that is a conclusive answer to the gentleman's objections.

It had often been asserted that there had been no parallel to this case of the Government borrowing money during a time of profound peace. This was an error, like others used in the heat of argument; but it was easy, by historical reference, to refute it. The Government, during the administration of Mr. Monroe, called for a loan of five millions, which was granted; and, as it was taken by the Bank of the United States, it was doubtless looked upon as a sound and judicious financial measure; but now that the money wanted is to be raised on the credit of the Government, independent of the banks, it is looked upon as waste and extravagance, and unconstitutional. In reply to Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. B. denied that the bill would cause the issue of a greater amount of Treasury notes than the ten millions authorized by the act of October last, six millions of which have been redeemed and cancelled; and, in point of fact, it was a loan asked for by the Government to the amount of ten millions, only to supply the place of such of the notes issued under the act of October last as have been, or shall be, taken in and cancelled by the Government. The debt, therefore, would not be increased beyond that sum to the amount of a dollar by this act. The bill authorized but a mere reissue of notes which was not authorized by that act. He had heard a great deal said about the waste and extravagance of the Administration; and he confessed that, with the knowledge he possessed of the votes of the different political parties in this body, he could not hear it without some degree of astonishment. Who, he asked, were constantly found voting for the most wild and extravagant appropriations? Surely gentlemen remembered to forget the history of their own course on these subjects, who now denounced the very extravagance that they themselves had been mainly instrumental in producing.

Mr. B. said that the journals of both houses of Congress might be very safely appealed to, as showing that the opposition to President Jackson's administration had almost uniformly favored a profuse and extravagant expenditure of the public money. When he had first taken his seat in that body, which was at the first session of Congress after the late President came into office, he had found the Opposition, which was mainly composed of the old American System party, almost uniformly urging and voting for the most wasteful appropriations of the public money. There was no system of pensioning, however great the charge which it was likely to bring on the Treasury, that did not, in the main, meet their favor and support. There was no object of internal improvement, however improper and unconstitutional, that did not find from them a warm sympathy and ready advocacy. They were, in the main, as a party, the supporters of the great project for a national road from Buffalo to New Orleans, the cost of which was estimated at from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars. It was this profuse system of extravagance, which at that day found so much favor with the Opposition, that led to the memorable veto of President Jackson, on the occasion of the Maysville road bill; at which time bills were pending before Congress for various projects of internal improvement, the estimated cost of which was largely upwards of one hundred millions, and which were mostly arrested by that memorable decision of the President, and the public Treasury saved from a system of the most wasteful prodigality. Who did not recollect, at that day, that the Administration of the late President was charged with a ruinous and parsimonious policy in regard to internal improvements? And why? Because the policy of the American System party required extravagant expenditures of the public money to keep up and sustain their favorite measure of high duties. It was true, that when some surplus had began to accumulate in the Treasury, and a plan for distribution among the States had been formed, the language of economy had sometimes been heard from that quarter. It was a much more rapid and expeditious way of operating on public opinion, to act on entire States, than by the slower and more detailed plan of acting on sections, by granting them appropriations for roads, rivers, &c. Hence this change, in his opinion, in the plan of the Opposition and American System party. He attributed it to no motives of economy on their part, for that was a principle somewhat alien to their policy, but to a design to use the very funds of the Government to break down those in power, by professing to hold out more of liberality towards the States. In this point of view he had always regarded the possession of a surplus more as a source of weakness than of patronage to those in power. By the dexterous use which the Opposition had been disposed to make use of it, it had been in reality turned against the Administration, and had been a source of patronage to those out of power, to aid their designs in obtaining power.

Mr. B. said, therefore, on a review of the whole course and policy of the two great political parties in this country, that no impartial mind could fail to arrive at the conclusion, that the policy of the late and present Administration had, by favoring a reduction of duties, and restricting appropriations for internal improvements, greatly promoted economy in the public expenditures, in comparison with the system of extravagance which would have prevailed if the policy of the Opposition had succeeded. It was not for those who had introduced and established an exorbitant system of duties and taxes, by which large and unnecessary sums were brought into the Treasury, to reproach others with extravagance. The sin was in having unnecessarily raised this money from the people; that was the mischief of which the public mostly complained; that was the real source of extravagance, and the great stimulus to it, no matter by what party committed, and its authors would be held accountable by the American people for all the consequences. Who they were, and to what party they mainly belonged, was matter of history. They had done more to injure the purity and simplicity of our Government than any other and every other party which had heretofore sprung up in this country.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that, holding as he did the particular position in reference to this bill, he was yet bound, out of respect to the body, and his anxiety for a speedy decision, to deny himself the privilege of replying to the many misrepresentations of the gentlemen on the other side. He had yet hopes that the question would be taken this evening, and in that hope he would refrain from consuming the time of the Senate by answering either of the gentlemen who had spoken against the bill. It was not necessary to take up the time of the Senate by answering all the misrepresentations which had been made. Some of them were well understood, and would be easily corrected. For instance, we have been told, said he, that ten millions of debt were contracted by the bill of the extra session, and that ten millions more were asked for now. Now every gentleman knew that ten millions could not be exceeded, and that not one dollar of Treasury notes could be issued under this bill, except to supply the place of a note that had been redeemed and cancelled. With reference to the amendment proposing to reduce the issue of Treasury notes to two millions, he would observe that there were the expenditures under the General Appropriation and Navy bills to be provided for and, in addition to that, a bill to meet the expense, of the Florida war, must soon be expected here; and from information they had, at least two millions had been expended on that object alone, and that drafts to a large amount for hat service were waiting here for the necessary appropriation to pay them. Could it, then, be expected that two millions would be enough?

After some remarks from Messrs. WEBSTER and CLAY,

Mr. BENTON rose for the purpose o answering the question how the Treasury came to be at present out of money. He should be able to answer that question out of the book, and in such a way that there should not be a man, woman, or child in the country but would be able to understand it. It was because the Congress of 1836 distributed among the States not only the surplus, but nine millions of appropriated moneys. [Mr. B. here read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing this fact.]

By the act of Congress of 1795, every appropriation made by Congress must remain two years to be applied to the object for which it was appropriated, and then, if not applied for, it was to go into the surplus fund. Every human being knew that money appropriated could not be expended in a day. Now, when the bill of 1836 was passed, this policy of the Government, established by the law of '95, was violated, and it took all the money in the Treasury on a certain day, whether it was appropriated or not. The distribution law was peremptory on that head, and divided the money, not that which remained after answering the appropriations, but that which was in the Treasury on the first of January. The stave-off policy was pursued then, as now, and it was mid-summer before the appropriation bill was passed, and therefore, as he stated, there was a recapture of the appropriations. Yes, sir; by this bill the appropriations were recaptured on the last day of December. He denounced the recapture at the time, and at the ensuing session, when the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that $9,646,000 had been recaptured, he called for the objects for which the appropriations thus recaptured had been made, and a detailed statement was made by the Secretary explaining them. These facts were known to every gentleman here, notwithstanding it is represented to the people that the Treasury is destitute in consequence of extravagance. If he had known that these statements would have been made, he would have provided himself with the document, and shown the portion of these appropriations that had been recaptured. These Treasury notes were now wanted to pay for them. He took his stand, [Mr. B. said] with five or six others, against this Distribution bill, and he now congratulated himself that he had done so. The consequences resulting from this bill had shown that he was right. He said at the time that it was an illusion; that there was no money; that it was all bank credits, that would vanish into nothing as soon as the banks were called upon. He remembered a former occasion, when all this song of a surplus was sung in the same key, and ended very much in the same manner. When he came into Congress, in Mr. Monroe's time, we had an income of forty millions, and a surplus of nine millions, and in the next year there was not a dollar—no recapture. In the first year he was here, eight millions were borrowed, and that too within a year after Mr. Monroe had called on Congress to know what to do with the surplus. He had risen to answer the question why the Treasury was out of money, and he had answered that it was because of the recapture of $9,646,000 by the distribution act. Another reason was that the banks had suspended payment with the money of the Government in their vaults, and Congress had given time to pay it in. They had also extended credit to the merchants on the duty bonds due by them—thus laying out of six millions of dollars; another reason was because they had divided twenty-eight millions among the States, and it was in vain to bamboozle the public with any other reasons.

Mr. TALLMADGE recollected the word "bamboozled." It had been quoted by the Senator as often in 1836 as to-day, and was a kind of catch phrase used for political effect. Mr. T. contended that if the deposite law had gone into operation as originally intended, all the present disasters would have been avoided. The Senator from Missouri has told us that he was proud he was one of the six that had stood up against that measure, and that he had warned gentlemen at the time it would destroy the banks. It so happened that two of the cashiers of banks of New York had told him to take the money out of their hands, and deposite it with the States, and that conversation was what induced him to make a proposition to that effect. It was well known the President said he would veto such a bill; and with this threat of the veto over our heads, the bill was not passed as originally drafted. If it had, we should now have had any money that we might have wanted, had it not been for Executive interference. Mr. T. said, if this act had not been passed, which arrested the eight or nine millions that the Senator spoke of, where would the gentlemen now have been if his magnificent schemes of fortifications had been carried out? If the report sent in by Secretary Cass had not had the effect to arrest this extravagant appropriation, instead of now being called on for ten millions, we should be required to give twenty or thirty millions.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he did not understand how this nine millions was recaptured.

Mr. BENTON. Here take the book and read it.

After some remarks from Mr. CRITTENDEN,

Mr. BENTON said he meant to speak out of the book, inasmuch as the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] had denied that the distribution act had contributed to the suspension of the banks, and gave as his authority information derived from gentlemen who were directors of two of the New York banks. Now he had a report made by Mr. Albert Gallatin and others at a convention of the city of New York banks, and as that report was made for all of them, the two banks alluded to by the Senator must have been of the number. The report was made before a meeting of all the banks of the city, and approved of by the whole of them. Mr. B. here read extracts from the report, in which it is asserted that the immediate cause which compelled the banks of New York to suspend specie payments were well known —they were the simultaneous withdrawal of the public deposites, etc.

[After reading a few extracts, Mr. B. continued.] Now here was an enumeration of the causes which produced a stoppage of the New York banks. Four causes were given; and one of them was the simultaneous withdrawal of the public deposites, etc. Now what caused the withdrawal of the public deposites? It was caused by the distribution act, and not by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the report adopted at a meeting of all the banks, assigned this as the first cause. This is what he asserted; and he was supported in the assertion by all the banks of New York. None of the extravagant appropriations were mentioned in the report of the New York banks. His fortification bill was not mentioned; and even the Specie Circular was not thought of.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the necessity of passing the Deposite act of 1836 was so imperious, and its benefit so manifest, that it required but little to be said in its vindication. Such was the urgency, that it is well known many who were disinclined to the measure felt compelled to give it their reluctant support, as the only possible means of extricating the country from overwhelming difficulties, and of saving any portion of the immense surplus that had accumulated in the Treasury, and which was still daily augmenting. If there had been no other argument in its favor, the one which is so clearly stated and forcibly urged in the late report of the Finance Committee on the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] was all-sufficient. That document clearly proves, as was urged at the time, that a vicious circle had been formed from the deposite banks to the speculators in lands, and from them to the land offices, and thence again to the banks; by which millions on millions of the choicest portions of the public domain were, at every revolution, passed from the people to the speculators for worthless bank notes. Every time the wheel went round, the surplus was increased, and the capacity for another and more sweeping revolution augmented in the same proportion. The Deposite act, by withdrawing the funds from the banks, and placing them in the safe-keeping of the States, cut and destroyed this circle, and broke down the speculation; which, if it had continued another year unchecked, would have transferred most of the public lands worth having from the Government to those whom the banks might choose to designate. It did more: it saved the large amount which was withdrawa from the banks, and safely deposited with the States; much of which, without it, must necessarily have been lost.

But we are told that the withdrawal of the funds from the banks was the cause of the suspension of specie payment. That the manner in which it was done accelerated that event, he did not doubt; but it was idle and preposterous to suppose that the suspension would not have taken place without it. The approximate cause of that was the indebtedness of the banks beyond their means of payment; and the withdrawal of the deposites, so far from contributing to its increase, was the most effectual measure that could be devised to arrest its further progress. Had the act not been passed, the indebtedness would have been vastly increased, and the explosions and loss to the country and the Government proportionably severe. As it could not be averted, the sooner it came the better; and admitting the act accelerated the event, it may fairly be set down as one of its benefits.

But we are also told that it is the cause of the present embarrassment of the Treasury, and that if we could command the deposites with the States, we should have ample means. That is true; but he did not regard it an evil. It is, on the contrary, a great good, and one intended by the passage of the act. In the midst of the vast profusion of means, which the now expiring protective tariff poured into the Treasury, the Government had lost all conception of economy and accountability. A habit of profusion and extravagance had grown up utterly inconsistent with republican simplicity and virtue, and which was rapidly sapping the foundation of our Government.

He foresaw the evil, and recommended, some years since, in a report on Executive patronage, the measure now complained of, as the only effectual remedy for the great and growing danger. He then saw clearly that nothing could reach the evil, but the withdrawal of the surplus revenue, which could only be effected by placing it in the custody of the States. This the deposite act did, and its operation now begins to tell. The Government can no longer indulge in boundless extravagance. It must economise. Necessity forces it. He rejoiced at the fact. Nothing short of it could bring it to its senses. He exempted neither party from censure. Both, with some exceptions, are equally to blame.

Among those who had resisted extravagant appropriations, he had constantly stood; and he now gave notice, that he would support no party that did not make economy and accountability a leading article in their creed and practice. They were essential to the preservation of free institutions. He regarded fifteen millions annually as ample for the support of the Government, under ordinary circumstances. He believed, indeed, that it might be well administered for three millions less, allowing for the navy five or six millions annually. Mr. Monroe's administration, which was charged with extravagance, did not average more than ten, deducting the payment on the national debt, although the pensions then were nearly as great as at present.

Mr. C. said that his colleague had made an objection against the constitutionality of this bill, which he deemed proper to notice. It was a rule with him, where the Constitution is supposed to be involved, to bestow his serious consideration before he acted; and, if he saw reasons to doubt, not to give his assent. He had complied with the rule in this case, and the result was a clear conviction that the bill was constitutional. The right had been exercised from the commencement of the Government without being before questioned; and, according to his conception, came within the powers expressly granted to Congress to borrow money, which meant neither more nor less than to raise supplies on the public credit. Interest was not essential to borrowing; and it would be ridiculous to suppose that the framers of the Constitution intended to authorize the raising of supplies with interest, and to prohibit it without it. But we are told that Treasury notes are bills of credit, and that the Constitution does not authorize Congress to issue bills of credit. He did not deem it necessary to go into a formal discussion on either point. He denied that they were bills of credit in any proper sense of those terms. They were intended to raise supplies to meet a temporary deficit in the Treasury, and were, in fact, nothing more than means of anticipating the revenue.

But he would not pursue the argument. He would bring it to a short and decisive issue with his colleague. His colleague is the strenuous advocate of the joint resolution of 1816, which authorizes the collection of the public dues in the notes of the specie-paying banks, and has no scruples as to the right of collecting in the notes of banks that do not pay specie. Now, no one will deny that to authorize the receipt of bank notes in the dues of the Government, is virtually to endorse on each note that it shall be received in the public dues; or that, if the Government had the right to do the one, it had the right to do the other. Nor will it be denied, that if the Government has the right to write on the back of a bank note, that it will be received in the public dues, it has an equal right to write the same on a blank piece of paper, or, which is the same thing, to make a Treasury note. The truth is, that to authorize bank notes to be received in the public dues, is neither more nor less than to make them, to that extent, Treasury notes, and is, pro tanto, as much the making and issuing such notes as if done on a separate piece of paper. If the one be unconstitutional, the other is clearly so. Now, he would make this bargain with his colleague and other advocates of the connection with the banks: if they will give up the use of bank paper by the Government, he would give up the use of Treasury notes; and if they will deny the constitutionality of receiving bank notes, he would not insist on the constitutionality of Treasury notes; and, in so doing, he should make a very good bargain for the country. But he was utterly unwilling to admit a construction which, while it denied to the Government the use of its own credit, would give the monopoly of it to the banks.

After some remarks from Messrs. PRESTON and TALLMADGE, the question was taken on Mr. WEBSTER's amendment, and it was rejected—yeas 16, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

After some further remarks from Mr. PRESTON,

Mr. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays on the question of engrossment, which were accordingly ordered; and

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to a third reading—yeas 27, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Preston, Robbins, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—13.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, May 19, 1838.

The Hon. LINN BANKS, member elect from the State of Virginia, in the place of Mr. PATTON appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. ALLEN of Ohio asked leave to submit a resolution for a post route.

Mr. CRAIG had not the slightest objection to the gentleman's resolution, but he must object to its putting aside other business, unless he and others could have a similar indulgence.

Mr. CAMBRELENG laid before the House a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, inclosing several communications from the Acting Quartermaster General, showing the pressing want of the appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, in order to carry on with efficiency the military operations concerted, and those now in progress. Among these was a letter from the Acting Quartermaster General, under date of April 25th, 1838, which says:

"I have not been able to make a single remittance of any consequence for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the last ten weeks, though the expenditures through this department have heretofore averaged full three hundred thousand dollars."

Another letter from the same officer, dated May 15th, 1838, says: "I regret very much that it was deemed advisable to propose the appropriation in the same minute detail, which was attempted in the estimate, instead of embracing all the objects of supply, and services due from the Quartermaster's Department, in the same amount, under one general head, while I am quite sure that the aggregate called for is not more than will be required. Some of the items will, no doubt, fall short, and others exceeds the wants of the service, since it is impossible to estimate the expenditures for armies engaged in active operations in the field, under each separate head, with sufficient accuracy for detailed appropriations. In that enactment, inconvenience will be experienced, unless power be vested in the Executive to transfer from one item to another, which I would respectfully suggest, if the present form of the bill be retained. I would also suggest the following modifications of the several items, without affecting the aggregate amount.

1st. For forage, say - - -	$400,000
2d. For freight, or transportation, of supplies, to the places of operation -	350,000
3d. For wagons, carts, &c. -	150,000
4th. For transportation of supplies from the depots to the points of consumption	700,000
5th. For hire of mechanics, laborers, drivers, &c. - - - - - - -	250,000
6th. For transportation, &c. of volunteers - - - - - - - -	100,000
7th. For miscellaneous and contingent charges - - - - - - - -	750,000
8th. For drafts and arrearages -	1,048,600
Total, corresponding with the estimate of 17th March, and the bill No. 676 of the House of Representatives - -	$3,748,600

Mr. CRARY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an unfavorable report in the case of Col. John Lowry.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, renewed his request to the House to act upon the Treasury building bill on Monday next, at two o'clock, and made a motion to that effect.

Mr. YELL and Mr. CAMBRELENG simultaneously asked for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were, yeas 67, nays 77; and so the resolution was again rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, on leave, presented a petition.

Mr. RUSSELL again asked leave to offer the resolution, presented to the House on Thursday, to repeal the small note restriction.

Objection being made, Mr. R. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were, yeas 51, nays 101, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Aycrigg, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crockett, Davies, Dunn, Everett, Evans, Ewing, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, Hall, Harlan, Henry, Lincoln, Maxwell, Mitchell, Noyes, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stone, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Yell—101.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

RECISION OF THE SPECIE CIRCULAR.

Mr. BOON then made a similar motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution to rescind the Specie Circular; and, for the first time, he said, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. B. explained, in order that the House might vote understandingly, that it was not his intention to press the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS, to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill on the subject,] but to present his own (a joint one and direct) as a substitute. [Mr. WILLIAMS stated, some days ago, that he would accept Mr. BOON's, as a modification of his own, should the rules be suspended.]

On the motion to suspend the rules the vote was 108 to 63, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, J. W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, John Campbell, William B. Carter, Casey, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Cleveland, Coffin, Corwin, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Foster, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Henry, Herod, R. Williams—63.

REPORT ON COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on commerce and navigation.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, moved to print 10,000 extra copies.

Mr. HARLAN hoped the gentleman would limit the number to 5,000, which he thought amply sufficient.

Mr. WHITTLESEY replied that 10,000 was the usual number heretofore printed, and added that he knew of no document of more general interest or intrinsic value, as well to the West as the East.

Mr. ADAMS said he supposed the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARLAN] was in the predicament of a certain King of Bohemia, who complained that he had no seaports in his dominions, and, therefore, that he [Mr. H.] could not appreciate the vast importance of this document, which, to the people of the Atlantic States, was of very great importance. Mr. A. hoped, therefore, that the motion for 10,000 would prevail.

The motion did prevail, and 10,000 copies accordingly ordered to be printed.

The "bill to establish a pension agency at McMinville, in the State of Tennessee," was taken up on its passage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD begged leave to inquire of some gentlemen from Tennessee, how many agencies they had there already; for, as Kentucky had but one, and could not succeed in establishing another, he must see the absolute necessity of an additional one for Tennessee, before he could vote for it.

Mr. McKAY inquired further, if the chairman of the Revolutionary Committee intended to call up the bill to provide for compensating pension agents; because, if so, Mr. M'K. should be unwillingly to act upon this bill at present.

Mr. MORGAN, in reply to the question by Mr. McKAY; said it was his intention to call up the bill at a suitable time, and to insist on its passage. In the mean time, however, it could do no harm to pass this bill; it would add nothing to the present expense of paying the pensioners in Tennessee, as the bill expressly provides that the ageney at McMinnville should be established only in the event that it could be done without expense to the United States. In reply to his friend from Kentucky, he would say, that the fact of Kentucky having but one pension agency, and Tennessee having more, did not argue, that if he would send the committee a resolution of instruction that the committee would not act favorably upon it, but the contrary. Let the gentleman try it, and he shall have a fair investigation.

Mr. SHIELDS responded to Mr. UNDERWOOD's question, by stating the necessity of establishing an agency at this point.

Mr. TURNEY advocated the bill. It had the unanimous concurrence of the Tennessee delegation, and added nothing to the expenses of the Government. Moreover, if the compensation bill should pass, it would not augment those expenses, because that bill proposed a per centum on the amount paid out at each agency.

Mr. MAXWELL should vote against it on the ground that there was a general law, conferring the power of appointing agencies on the proper department; and, if it was needed, that duty could be performed.

The vote on the passage of the bill was 44 to 89: so it was rejected.

The bill for the relief of the administrator of Wharton Quarles, deceased, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Jordan, deceased, late a Captain in the Continental line of artificers was taken up on its passage, and was opposed by Mr. ALLEN of Vermont, who went with much minuteness and historical detail into the question, and was sustained by Mr. UNDERWOOD, the main point in issue being whether an officer of the corps of artificers should be considered as an officer of the regular army. Mr. CRAIG also briefly sustained the bill.

Mr. ALLEN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALL then followed in opposition to the bill, and the discussion was continued for a short time by Mr. MENCER and Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Before coming to any decision—

Mr. ALLEN moved an adjournment.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 46, nays 56, so the motion was rejected.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then moved a call of the House, which was refused—ayes 40, noes 47.

Mr. POTTS moved an adjournment, which was carried without a division.

So the House adjourned.

Messrs. WHITTLESEY, MASON, HARPER, KILGORE, BOND, RIDGEWAY, SHEPLER, ALLEN, COFFIN, GOODE, and MORRIS.

At this stage—

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS presented the petition of 177 of the inhabitants of Marietta and its vicinity, respectfully requesting Congress to interpose its authority, and prevent the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee nation from being carried into effect, without the well-ascertained assent of that nation to said treaty. On presenting this petition, Mr. M. said:

Mr. Speaker, the names which I find attached to this petition command too much respect at home and abroad to justify me, as their Representative, in barely presenting the petition and permitting it to be laid on the table, as similar petitions have been, without some effort on my part to procure its reference, and for it a respectful consideration.

Marietta was the first settlement made in that Territory, which now constitutes the State of Ohio; and upon this petition I find the names of some who encountered the dangers, endured the toils, and suffered that privations connected with the early settlement of the country. Thrown as they were in the midst of Indian hostilities, and mingling, as they subsequently did, with them in the more friendly relations of life, afforded them a good opportunity of becoming acquainted with the Indian character, and, knowing it, they know how to appreciate it. In the petition they express their fears that the treaty was obtained fraudulently, and with these feelings, sir, they are too honorable, too highminded, and too magnanimous to remain silent, and see their country inflicting, as they believe, cruel and unmitigated wrongs upon a weak, but magnanimous people. [Here the Speaker reminded Mr. M. that it was not in order to debate this question at this time.] Mr. M. replied: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that it is not in order to discuss the merits of this question on the presentation of a petition, nor do I wish, on this, or any other occasion to violate the rules of this House.

I will only add one or two remarks more, and if, in so doing, I am out of order, I will thank the Speaker to remind me of it.

I am informed, sir, by a letter which accompanied the petition, and from a source highly respectable, that our people have a good deal of feeling on the subject of this treaty. If their suspicions are well founded, ought not Congress to immediately institute an inquiry into the facts connected with it; and if they are groundless, the Government has nothing to fear from such an investigation. But, sir, let this House refuse to refer or consider the petitions of the people on this subject, and do you not, I ask, throw around the whole transaction dark suspicions, which every lover of the honor of his country ought to reprobate?

Mr. OWENS moved to lay it on the table, (being a disposition made of numerous others during the day, on motion of Mr. O. and Mr. HAYNES, without a division of the House.)

Mr. MORRIS demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a call of the House, as the attendance of members was thin; but it was refused, and the motion to lay on the table was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 71, as follows:

Also, by Mr. ANDERSON of Maine, Mr. CORWIN, of Ohio, and Mr. SIBLEY, of New York; those gentlemen having been out of their seats when their respective States were called.

MR. BOON'S RESOLUTION.

Mr. BOON rose and asked permission of the House to make an explanation in reference to himself.

Leave being granted—

Mr. B. proceeded. He said it would be recollected that, some days since, he had offered a resolution, the object of which was to equalize the currency receivable for the public dues. That resolution was, however, decided to be out of order, inasmuch as the same subject, in a somewhat different form, was already before the House under two resolutions presented by gentlemen from Ohio and Kentucky, [Messrs. BOND and WILLIAMS.] The former gentleman promptly withdrew his proposition, but the gentleman from Kentucky adhered to his; and Mr. B. had no alternative, therefore, left him to arrive at his object but to move to take up Mr. WILLIAMS's resolution; not with a view to its adoption, but of asking the gentleman so to modify it as to substitute that of Mr. B. This morning he thought he had made an arrangement with that gentleman, so far as he [Mr. B.] was concerned, to accommodate the measure. The gentleman presented to Mr. B. a modification, which it was his intention, he said, to send to the Chair upon the suspension of the rules, and which Mr. B. accepted. After that, the gentleman proposed a further amendment, which he said he intended to offer, but which Mr. B. could not accept. The gentleman then said that his resolution might lie on the table, and, added Mr. B. as I have no disposition to adopt it, unless the gentleman changes his opinion, and substitutes my resolution or the modification of it, I have no other alternative left me, sir, but to take my seat.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana,

On motion of Mr. Allen of Ohio,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Cleaveland, Ohio, through Independence, Brecksville, Richfield, Bath, Copley, Morton, and Clinton, to Massillon, in the county of Stark.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING,

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reannexing the counties of Franklin and Calhoun to the Western Judicial District of Florida, and of confirming the law of the Legislative Council of said Territory, passed at its last session, to divide said counties, and for other purposes, relating to said division.

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Brandonville, in the State of Virginia, to Byant's post office, in the State of Pennsylvania.

On motion of Mr. SHIELDS of Tennessee,

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to the legal representatives of Dr. James H. Chiars, for services performed by him as assistant surgeon of the army in Florida.

On motion of Mr. CARTER of Tennessee,

Resolved, That the Committe on Roads and Canals inquire into the expediency of authorizing a survey of the Tennessee river above the Muscle Shoals, and of the river Holston from its mouth to Kingsport, in Sullivan county, in Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the route No. 708 from Ephratah, through Pleasant Valley, to Newkirk's Mills, in Montgomery county, and State of N. York.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved that the House go into Committee on the state of the Union on the appropriation bills.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana gave notice, that when in committee, he should move to take up the pre-emption rights bill.

Messrs. BRIGGS, WHITTLESEY, and EVERETT, requested the gentleman not to press that motion, but suffer the balance of the day to be devoted to the current business, and the latter gentleman objecting—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BOON asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a call of the House: refused.

The motion to suspend being agreed to—yeas 106, nays 37—the House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOWARD in the Chair.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, after referring to the number of protested drafts still unpaid by the Government, and stating that he desired to have that protested paper paid before proceeding to other business, moved to take up the following bill:

"A bill making appropriations for the preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrears for the year 1837."

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, pursuant to his notice given above, then moved to take up the pre-emption rights bill, saying that he feared the other bill would cause an extended discussion, and it was important that the bill he moved should be acted upon without delay.

The committee accordingly rose and reported that fact to the House.

Messrs. CAMBRELENG, OWENS, and CUSHMAN simultaneously moved a call of the House, for the purpose of procuring a quorum, but the motion was suspended till the SPEAKER counted the House, and upon ascertaining that a quorum was actually present, the House again went into committee, and the question being again propounded, on taking up the bill to suppress Indian hostilites, &c. it resulted, taken by tellers, as follows: ayes 94, noes not counted.

This bill was accordingly taken up, and having been read through by the Clerk—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was at a loss how to proceed; if he did not make a speech, it would be alleged by some that he left the bill to be fought by the Opposition; and if he did make a speech, it might be alleged by some as it had been by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on a former occasion, that he would be the cause of any delay and debate that might follow. He briefly stated the necessity of a speedy action, saying that $700,000 of protested drafts were now lying, and the suffering fell, not upon the Government, but upon individuals who were forced by delay into the hands of brokers and money shavers, at ruinous sacrifices. This part of the appropriation should be immediately acted upon as a matter of justice. In relation to the war in Florida, he remarked that he thought it was now brought nearly to a close; and he did not think a dollar would be required after these appropriations to maintain that war, and that no extraordinary appropriations would hereafter be wanted. The appropriations for the support of military force, in the Cherokee country, was intended to preserve that people from hostilities with the neighboring citizens.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then submitted some amendments, which were adopted.

Mr. EVERETT then offered a paper, which he said he should offer at a future time, as an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to afford just and equitable compensation to the Indians, and such as he thought would induce the Cherokees to remove, probably in the course of this fall. He said he did not know that the amendment would meet the views of the Government or the Indians, for he had consulted with neither party, but he wished the paper printed, that it might be considered and acted upon hereafter. The following is a copy of the paper:

For the payment to the Cherokee nation, after their emigration, the sum stipulated in the 1st art. of the treaty of 29th December, 1835, deducting $500,000 under the 2d art. and $400,000 invested under the 10th art. - - -	$4,100,000
Provided, the Cherokee nation assent so to receive it.
To enable the President to repurchase the lands ceded by the 2d art. of said treaty - - -	500,000
For payments to the Cherokee nation for the benefit of the Cherokees who have not taken the benefit of said treaty
1. For compensation in full for all claims for their improvements -	2,250,000
2. For compensation for personal property which may be abandoned, not provided for by said treaty -	750,700
3. For compensation for spoliations in full - - - -	300,000
4. For commutation for claims for pensions under 14th art. - -	50,000

Provided, that no part of the appropriations in this article shall be expended, unless a majority of such Cherokees shall have emigrated west of the Mississippi by the 1st of January next; nor until the said Cherokee nation east shall have agreed so to receive said sums in full for said claims.

For compensation to such Cherokees as shall emigrate at their own expense, by 1st January next, at $33⅓ per head (15,000 Cherokees)	500,000
For subsistence, extended to eighteen months, to such emigrants, $50 per head, (15,000 Cherokees) -	750,000

Mr. BELL remarked that he considered the bill one of the utmost importance, and he wished to offer an amendment, with some remarks. If his amendment should be met with an amicable spirit, he should not go at length into the subject; and he should not, whatever he might think of the expediency or justice of the Florida war, do any thing to oppose the appropriations for that object. He then offered the following amendment:

"Provided, that if the President shall ascertain that all dissatisfaction and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of 1835 can be allayed or avoided by allowing an additional compensation for lands ceded to the United States by said treaty, and that thereby the Government may be saved the expense of keeping up the large military force within the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of dollars of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

The amendment of Mr. CAMBRELENG, above alluded to, was adopted.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that the amendment of Mr. EVERETT was not in order upon this bill, which was for Indian hostilities, and would be better to be proposed to the bill for Indian annuities, when it should come up. There was, also, an objection to the amendment of Mr. BELL, though not so strong; but he would not press it then.

Mr. WISE then moved that the committee rise and report progress; which motion prevailed.

In the House, Mr. EVERETT offered his proposed amendment, and asked to have it printed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that it would be better to have the bill printed as amended in committee, with the amendment annexed, to which Mr. EVERETT assented; and in that form the motion prevailed.

A report from the Secretary of War, accompanied by a report from the head of the Topographical Bureau was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill for the relief of James Witherell, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Carter, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of John Jordan, was, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, postponed to Friday next.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the bill to authorize the employment of boys in the merchant service, was postponed till to-morrow.

The joint resolution authorizing the employment of clerks in the Department of State, was, on motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, laid on the table.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the appointment of an additional judge in the Orphan's Court in the District of Columbia, was then taken up, with an amendment prepared by the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWSON said that an objection had been made by Mr. MERCER to this amendment, on the ground of unconstitutionality; and he (Mr. D.) contended that, inasmuch as the District of Columbia was a Territory of the United States, according ing to the decisions of the Supreme Court, therefore Congress had full power over it, as much as over Wisconsin or Florida.

Mr. MERCER thought the position of the District of Columbia sui generis, and not that of a Territory. Every judge under the Constitution of the United States is appointed for life, and no instance to the contrary can be shown.

Mr. HAYNES instanced justices of the peace in the District of Columbia as holding office by a limited tenure.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that in the committee he had opposed this bill, but, being in the minority, he consented to have it reported to the House, with the amendment, limiting the term of service to four years. His opposition was predicated on the grounds that the continuance of a person in the receipt of a salary, without rendering any services to the public, was in fact creating and continuing a sinecure in violation of the Constitution, and contrary to the spirit of our free institutions. Our country was fast following the footsteps of the Governments in Europe, by continuing men in office out of mere sympathy, or because they belonged to respectable families, although unable to discharge the duties of the office. The Departments in the city of Washington furnished many examples of this kind, and it was high time Congress should, by their action, furnish a precedent to those administering the Government to correct this abuse. In this case, if the present incumbent was incapable of discharging the duties of a judge, and Congress had the power, under the Constitution, to remove him, let members discharge their duties by addressing the President for that purpose, and if Congress has not the constitutional power to remove him, let the Constitution be amended for that purpose, and that can be done by the meeting of next Congress.

Mr. P. said he was opposed to sinecures of every kind; and a hard case, or mere expediency, was no apology for members violating the Constitution. It was a well known fact that in all ages public good had been an apology for tyrants setting at naught the rights of the people, and expediency, the excuse of usurpers for trampling upon the liberties of the people. When members objected to the limitation of the term of service of a judge, on constitutional grounds, and at the same time advocated the continuance of an officer in the enjoyment of a sinecure, he thought, to say the least of it, they took a one-sided view of the Constitution. He did not suppose, however, that any thing he could say would alter the determination of members on this subject, but he could not, consistently with his conscientious notions of what was his duty, suffer a matter so grossly wrong, in his opinion, as the present bill is, to pass without raising his voice against it.

Mr. BOULDIN said he supposed, as he was chairman of the committee, it would be expected of him to say something in relation to this bill; yet he knew that by wearying the House by such debate, he might hazard the bill, rather than render it more secure.

He said his mind had been long made up, that during good behavior was the best tenure for a judge to hold his office by; that when a change is made from good behavior in such offices, it is generally found to be for bad behavior. He knew there was a difference of opinion upon this point, and he would not provoke argument, as the District really was suffering for a judge. The present incumbent was, by visitation of Providence, rendered unable to do the duties of his office.

There could be no constitutional difficulty in appointing an additional judge. There was no particular number of judges constitutionally required in this case. It might be that the incumbent ought to resign, but he had not; and Mr. B. was not aware of any mode by which he could be compelled to do so; and if he could, it would be difficult to prove he ought to be prosecuted for this visitation; and though all this were right and practicable, yet it would take much time to do it, and in the mean time the people would suffer much. The appointment of another judge would not prevent a prosecution and removal of the present incumbent, should it be practicable and proper.

Mr. B. had given his own opinion on this bill in as few words as he could, and would prefer to pass the bill himself as it came from the Senate; but he was so sure that the people were in great need of help in this particular, that he would vote for almost any measure that would give relief—any thing within the pale of the Constitution. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would pass to-day.

Mr. JENIFER and Mr. DAWSON had a few words of conversation, which (on account of the great confusion and noise in the hall) were entirely inaudible.

Mr. ADAMS thought that, if the pending amendment was constitutional, then Congress could remove the present judge. He considered that an officer who did not discharge the duties of the office he held did not hold it "during good behavior." It was inconsistent to say that the assistant judge should hold his office under the Constitution for four years, and that the other judge of the same court should hold his during good behavior. This was a provision to change the tenure of office of the judge of the orphans' court. If Congress can, constitutionally, change this tenure of office, the President may, on application, remove the office existing. He hoped that neither the amendment nor the bill would pass. He thought the proper course would be to impeach the officer for incompetency. This had been done, and it seemed to be the true and proper mode.

Mr. POPE thought the amendment ought not to pass to this bill. If this question of the proper tenure of office were to be discussed, it should be at another time. At present, he looked upon this as a necessary measure for the transaction of business in this District, and it was the duty of Congress to see that the rights of the District ought to be religiously and sacredly preserved. He hoped the amendment would be withdrawn.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said he had but little to say upon the subject under consideration; nor would he say that little, but for the fact that there were two important questions involved in the bill. The first was, have the people of the District of Columbia any constitutional protection? Are they citizens of the United States, or subjects of an aristocratic despotism? By the act of cession they were stripped of the protective power of the constitutions of Virginia and Maryland; and if they were not within the protective power of the Constitution of the United States, unlike all other American citizens, they were without any constitutional protection whatever, but the unqualified subjects of the power of Congress, which can exercise over them unlimited and unqualified authority. He did not doubt that, as far as the Constitution applied, the people of the District of Columbia were as much entitled to its broad shield as they were before the act of cession. He would not now enter into the discussion of that question, but would content himself with this mere expression of opinion. If the Constitution did not not extend to the District of Columbia, he said that its principles and its spirit might be carried into the legislation of Congress affecting it, and thus extend its beneficial and protective powers as successfully as if it was directly applicable; and there was no subject on which its principles could be more profitably applied than in the limitation of the judicial tenure.

The second question involved was, whether Congress, in establishing the judicial tenure, could, in reference to the District of Columbia, disregard the limitation prescribed in the Constitution, of "good behavior," and affix to it a term of years? The only power which this Government has to establish a judiciary is derived from the Constitution, but the tenure of the judicial office is not left to the discretion of Congress, but is fixed by the Constitution itself. If, then, this Government has none but expressly delegated powers, I might safely inquire, where is the authority to limit the judicial tenure to a term of years? The Constitution having affixed the tenure, Congress has no power over it, and any other tenure would be a usurpation of power, and contrary to the true spirit of that instrument. He said he did not now propose to enter into an elaborate discussion of this important question, but would content himself with remarking, that when the act passed, establishing the Orphans' Court of the District of Columbia, the judge was regarded as a judicial officer, and the tenure of his office limited by the authority of the Constitution; and it would now be establishing a dangerous precedent to disregard it. He thought it wise to adhere to the principles and spirit of the Constitution upon all occasions, and in none more pertinaciously than the tenure of the judicial office. There was no principle in Government more important and more necessary to any people than a faithful, an honest, and well qualified judiciary, and there were no other means by which it could be accomplished than by affixing a tenure of office which, while it is placed within the reach of ample responsibility, is secured from the effects of sudden popular excitement and unfounded prejudices. This blessing is as important to the people of the District as to any portion of the people of the Union; and it would be unwise and impolitic to distinguish between them and the people of the States. No man who possessed the proper qualifications of a judge would accept the office with a tenure of four years, and a liability to have his commission struck dead in his hands by those ebullitions of popular excitement which frequently spring up on account of his decisions. To secure competent and well-qualified judges, there must be permanency in the tenure as well as adequacy in compensation; and the value of the judiciary will be entirely destroyed when opposite principles are acted upon. The tenure affixed in the amendment proposed by the Committee for the District of Columbia, would, in its general application, be dangerous in practice and subversive of the best interests of the country. It was in accordance with that spirit which had commenced limiting the tenure of the judicial office to a fixed age in some places—to ten years in some, and seven in others—a spirit which, said Mr. G. was undermining the stability of the system, destroying its most valuable features, and would ultimately throw the judiciary into the hands of the ignorant, the illiterate, and the demagogical. He thought a rebuke of this destructive spirit would come with great force from Congress, by strictly adhering to the wise and salutary tenure prescribed in the Constitution, which its framers would not confide to Congressional discret on.

Mr. G. said the temporary additional judge proposed to be appointed for the Orphans' Court of the District of Columbia, would not establish a sinecure, but grew out of the actual necessity of the case. In the organization of the Court, a single judge had been appointed. That judge not not misbehave'p but by the afflicting hand of Providence, had been rendered incompetent. He cannot be compelled to resign his office, nor can he be removed. This bill, in this state of things, (Congress not being limited by the Constitution as to the number of judges which it may assign to a court,) proposes to appoint an additional judge; who, notwithstanding the incompetency of the present judge, may despatch the business which belongs to the jurisdiction of that court. The remedy for this state of things would, in all probability, soon be applied by the hand of nature in a few years at most. The present incumbent would be removed by the hand of time; and then, by declining to supply the vacancy, the Court will be restored to its original organization. The question, then, was, whether the expense of an additional judge shall be incurred, so as to dispose of the business of the Court, or shall it remain blocked up, to the great annoyance and oppression of the people of the District, until Providence shall remove the obstruction, by the death of the incumbent? Mr. G. said he should, without hesitation, vote against the amendment proposed by the committee, and for the bill.

The amendment was lost.

The question recurring upon the passage of the bill to a third reading,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays, which were not ordered.

The bill was then passed to a third reading without a division, and was ordered to be read a third time then.

It was read accordingly, and passed.

Mr. PETRIKIN then demanded a count, to ascertain if a quorum was present.

The SPEAKER reported 123 present; not a quorum.

Mr. BOULDIN then moved an adjournment; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. POPE, who asked the unanimous consent of the House to take up and pass a bill for the relief of the widow of Capt. Thomas Hunter.

Objections were made.

Mr. POPE moved to suspend the rules, and said it was an urgent case. The widow of Capt. Hunter, by a mistake, had been deprived of a part of the pension to which she was entitled, and unless she could obtain this justice from the Government soon, all her little remaining property would be swept away.

The question being taken on suspending the rule, there were, ayes 86, noes 19; not a quorum.

Mr. GRIFFIN moved an adjournment, which was lost, yeas 32, nays 65.

Mr. WHITTLESEY hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania would withdraw his opposition, and allow the bill to be taken up.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he could not withdraw his opposition, and referred to the course of proceeding last Friday and Saturday, when it was impossible to keep a quorum in the House. He did not like this manner of hopping off, and of gentlemen cutting up their own peculiar business out of order. He then renewed the motion to adjourn.

Mr. POPE appealed earnestly to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the motion, and let the bill be passed. He said he had no interest in it; but he knew it was necessary and just.

The question was then taken on the adjournment, and was, ayes 25, noes 79; so the House refused to adjourn, and there was not a quorum.

Mr. POPE then said he would yield, and not insist upon detaining the House fruitlessly; and, upon his motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, May 21, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from merchants and underwriters, residents of Philadelphia, stating that wrecked property at Key West was carried in, and a sale of it made before any agent could be sent on, in consequence of which it could make very little difference whether the wrecked property should be lost or sold. They, therefore, prayed that a law might be passed requiring at least sixty days' notice to be given before wrecked property should be sold: referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, calling for the action of Congress to suppress duelling; and stating that the practice among public men was of evil example and tendency: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented a petition from Mr. Cogswell, asking Congress for compensation for serving a venire, which, for some reasons, was refused at the Department: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of Jasper Cox, praying indemnification for loss sustained from captures by the Indians: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McKEAN presented two memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the Cherokee treaty may not be enforced: laid on the table.

Mr. NILES presented two memorials from citizens of Connecticut, praying that the Cherokee treaty may not be enforced: laid on the table.

Mr. BAYARD presented a petition from sundry citizens, asking that the Cherokee treaty may not be enforced: laid on the table.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of the citizens of Paducah, Kentucky, praying that Francis A. Harrison may be secured from loss by the burning of the Post Office: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PLAN OF A NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, rose, and stated that he wished to present a petition confided to his care, signed by a number of persons, praying for the establishment of a Bank of the United States. It was similar to several other petitions which had been presented to the Senate, or to the House, during the present session, praying for the same object. They afford evidence of a deep and returning conviction, among the people, of the utility of such an institution.

Whilst I am up [continued Mr. CLAY,] with the permission of the Senate, I beg leave to submit a few observations upon this subject. There is reason to believe that much honest misconception and some misrepresentation prevail in regard to it, which I wish to correct. It had been supposed that those who are desirous of seeing a Bank of the United States established are anxious that a charter should be granted to an existing State institution, which has an eminent individual at its head, and that this was the sole object of all their exertions. Now I wish, for one, to say, that I have no such purpose in view. I entertain for that gentleman very high respect. I believe him uncommonly able, profoundly skilled in finance, and truly patriotic. There is but one other person, connected with the banking institutions of the country, in whose administration of a Bank of the United States I should have equal confidence with Mr. Biddle, and that is Albert Gallatin, who, I am glad to learn, at an advanced age, retains, in full vigor, the faculties of his extraordinary mind. There may be other citizens equally competent with those two gentlemen, but I do not know them, or am not acquainted with their particular qualifications.

But it is not for any existing State bank, or any particular individual at its head, that I am contending. I believe the establishment of a Bank of the United States is required by the common good of the whole country; and although I might be willing, if it were practicable, to adopt an existing bank as the basis of such an institution, under all circumstances, I think it most expedient that a new bank, with power to establish branches, be created and chartered under the authority of Congress. My friends (as far as I know their opinions) and I are not particularly attached to this or that individual, to this or that existing bank, but to principles, to the thing itself, to the institution, to a well-organized Bank of the United States, under the salutary operation of which the business of the country had so greatly prospered, and we had every reason to hope would again revive and prosper. And, presuming upon the indulgence of the Senate, I will now take the liberty to suggest, for public consideration, some of those suitable conditions and restrictions under which it appears to me that it would be desirable to establish a new bank.

1. The capital not to be extravagantly large, but, at the same time, amply sufficient to enable it to perform the needful financial duties for the Government; to supply a general currency of uniform value throughout the Union; and to facilitate, as nigh as practicable, the equalization of domestic exchange. I suppose that about fifty millions would answer all those purposes. The stock might be divided between the General Government, the States, according to their federal population, and individual subscribers; the portion assigned to the latter to be distributed at auction or by private subscription.

2. The corporation, in the spirit of a resolution recently adopted by the General Assembly of the State, one of whose Senators I have the honor to be, to receive such an organization as to blend, in fair proportions, public and private control, and combining public and private interests; and, in order to exclude the possibility of the exercise of all foreign influence, non-resident foreigners to be prohibited not only from any share in the administration of the corporation, but from holding, directly or indirectly, any portion of its stock. Although I do not myself think this latter restriction necessary. I would make it, in deference to honest prejudices, sincerely entertained, and which no practical statesman ought entirely to disregard. The bank would thus be, in its origin, and continue throughout its whole existence, a genuine American institution.

3. An adequate portion of the capital to be set apart in productive stocks, and placed in permanent security, beyond the reach of the corporation, (with the exception of the accruing profits on those stocks,) sufficient to pay promptly, in any contingency, the amount of all such paper, under whatever form, that the bank shall put forth as a part of the general circulation. The bill or note holders, in other words, the mass of the community, ought to be protected against the possibility of the failure or the suspension of a bank. The supply of the circulating medium of a country is that faculty of a bank, the propriety of the exercise of which may be most controverted. The dealings with a bank, of those who obtain discounts, or make deposites, are voluntary and mutually advantageous; and they are comparatively few in number. But the reception of what is issued and used as a part of the circulating medium of the country, is scarcely a voluntary act; and thousands take it who have no other concern whatever with the bank. The many ought to be guarded and secured by the care of the legislative authority; the vigilance of the few will secure them against loss. I think this provision is a desideratum in our American banking; and the credit of first embodying it in a legislative act is due to the State of New York.

4. Perfect publicity as to the state of the bank at all times, including, besides the usual heads of information, the names of every debtor to the bank, whether as drawer, endorser, or surety, periodically exhibited, and open to public inspection; or, if that should be found inconvenient, the right to be secured to any citizen to ascertain at the bank the nature and extent of the responsibility of any of its customers. There is no necessity to throw any veil of secrecy around the ordinary transactions of a bank. Publicity will increase responsibility, repress favoritism, insure the negotiation of good paper, and, when individual insolvency unfortunately occurs, will deprive the bank of undue advantages now enjoyed by banks practically in the distribution of the effects of the insolvent.

5. A limitation of the dividends so as not to authorize more than — per cent. to be struck. This will check undue expansions in the circulating medium, and restrain improper extension of business in the administration of the bank.

6. A prospective reduction in the rate of interest, so as to restrict the bank to six per cent. simply, or, if practicable, to only five per cent. Banks now receive at the rate of near 6% per cent. by demanding the interest in advance, and by charging for an additional day. The reduction may be effected by forbearing to exact any bonus, or, when the profits are likely to exceed the prescribed limit of the dividends, by requiring that the rate of interest shall be so lowered as that they shall not pass that limit.

7. A restriction upon the premium demanded upon post notes and checks used for remittances, so that the maximum should not be more than, say, one and a half per cent. between any two of the remotest points in the Union. Although it may not be practicable to regulate foreign exchange, depending as it does upon commercial causes not within the control of any one Government, I think that it is otherwise with regard to domestic exchange.

8. Every practicable provision against the exercise of improper influence, on the part of the Executive, upon the bank, and, on the part of the bank, upon the elections of the country. The late Bank of the United States has been, I believe, most unjustly charged with interference in the popular elections. There is, among the public documents, evidence of its having scrupulously abstained from such interference. It never did more than to exercise the natural right of self-defence by publishing such reports, speeches, and documents, as tended to place the institution and its administration in a fair point of view before the public. But the people entertain a just jealousy against the danger of any interference of a bank with the elections of the country, and every precaution ought to be taken strictly to guard against it.

This is a brief outline of such a new Bank of the United States as I think, if established, would greatly conduce to the prosperity of the country. Perhaps, on full discussion and consideration, some of the conditions which I have suggested might not be deemed expedient, or might require modification, and important additional ones may be proposed by others.

I will only say a word or two on the constitutional power. I think that it ought no longer to be regarded as an open question. There ought to be some bounds to human controversy. Stability is a necessary want of society. Among those who deny the power, there are many who admit the benefits of a Bank of the United States. Four times, and under the sway of all the political parties, have Congress deliberately affirmed its existence. Every Department of the Government has again and again asserted it. Forty years of acquiescence by the people; uniformity every where in the value of the currency; facility and economy in domestic exchanges, and unexampled prosperity in the general business of the country, with a Bank of the United States; and, without it, wild disorder in the currency, ruinous irregularity in domestic exchange, and general prostration in the commerce and business of the nation, would seem to put the question at rest, if it is not to be perpetually agitated. The power has been sustained by Washington, the Father of his Country; by Madison, the Father of the Constitution; and by Marshall, the Father of the Judiciary. If precedents are not to be blindly followed, neither ought they to be wantonly despised. They are the evidence of truth; and the force of the evidence is in proportion to the integrity, wisdom, and patriotism of those who establish them. I think that on no occasion could there be an array of greater or higher authority. For one, I hope to be pardoned for yielding to it, in preference to submitting my judgment to the opinion of those who now deny the power, however respectable they may be.

But, Mr. President, strong as my convictions are, I have no intention of formally presenting any proposition to establish a Bank of the United States. Composed as Congress and the Executive now are, it would be an unnecessary waste of time to offer such a proposal. I should regret to see a bank established, unless it were clearly called for by public opinion. I believe it is now desired by a majority of the people of the United States. But of that there does not exist perhaps any conclusive evidence. Let us wait until demonstrations of their will shall be clearly given; and let us all submit, and, for one, I shall most cheerfully, to their decision, whatever it may be. Mr. C. moved that the petition be laid on the table.

After some remarks from Mr. ALLEN, which will be given hereafter—

Mr. BUCHANAN said that his peculiar position in regard to this question rendered it proper that he should make some remarks upon the subject. He was opposed to the charter of any Bank of the United States, be it located where it might. It would, in his opinion, prove to be a great evil to the country any where and every where. It appeared from the Senator's remarks that he and his friends were in favor of the establishment of a new bank in the city of New York, with Albert Gallatin for its president. In this inference he thought he could not be mistaken. The Bank was to be new; it was not to be Mr. Biddle's Bank; and Mr. Gallatin had been eulogized, no doubt justly, as a gentleman eminently qualified to conduct a National Bank. New York then was to be the place, and Mr. Gallatin the president.

Mr. B. said he had risen, as a Senator from Pennsylvania, solemnly to protest against this determination of the gentleman and his friends to exclude Philadelphia, and to establish a new Bank of the United States in New York. Although he should oppose such an establishment, whether in the one city or in the other, yet, if it must exist, he should stand up for the metropolis of his own State as the more suitable location. It would be invidious, as well as unjust, to abandon Philadelphia for New York. If you establish a National Bank in New York, with a capital of fifty millions of dollars, you would render the whole Union tributary to that city, whilst you would greatly impair, if not destroy, the prosperity of our other commercial cities. Three-fifths of the revenue derived from customs was now collected at the port of New York. This amount of revenue, at least, without speaking of the remainder, would be deposited in the mother bank, and become the foundation of discounts and circulation, and of a commanding influence throughout the Union. All the markets of the country could be regulated and controlled by such a bank, and the business of all our commercial cities would be gradually drawn into the vast vortex of New York. Why should three-fifths of the duties collected in the United States be used in New York for the purpose of giving her a control over our other commercial cities? It is true the revenue was collected there; but who eventually pays it? The consumers—the people of the country scattered over every State of the Union. Why, then, should it be converted into a deposit for the exclusive purpose of extending the commercial superiority of New York at the expense of other cities? Let each one of them depend upon its own energy and resources, without any partial aid from Government.

Mr. B. was rejoiced that the Senator had come out and, in a bold and manly manner, presented his project of a National Bank. The two great parties of the country would now know precisely where they stood. From this day, the issue would be fairly formed and distinctly presented to the people. On the one side there was a National Bank, with a capital of fifty millions, sustained by the revenues of the Government, and enjoying the privilege of having its notes received in payment of all the public dues; whilst on the other, we desired a separation—a friendly separation—of the business of the Treasury from that of all banks, leaving each one of them to its own resources, and to perform its own duties, without danger of being crushed or controlled by a mammoth institution. We wished to part from them in peace, and to remain at peace with them, interposing no obstacles in the way of their healthy and vigorous action. We leave them to be regulated by the States to which they belong. He did not fear the final result of such a trial before the American people.

It was a work of supererogation for the Senator from Kentucky to have inserted in his charter any provision to prevent the Government from warring against the Bank, or the Bank from warring against the Government. For the last few years we had witnessed the exception to the rule; but we should never witness it again. Money and political power mutually attracted each other, and were always ready to rush to each other's embrace. Establish such a bank as the Senator had proposed, and there never would be any divorce between it and those in power. The General Government was to be combined with all the State Governments as stockholders in this institution; and to these sovereignties were to be added a number of wealthy individuals. You would thus bind the United States and the States together in solid phalanx, and unite them all indissolubly with the money power of the country. Such a measure would be the longest stride towards consolidation which had ever been made under the Constitution; and such a bank would be able and willing to keep any Administration in power which might call it into existence. The political power and the money power would support each other, and their connection would be perpetuated by the strongest ties of mutual interest. No, sir; no, sir; we shall have no more wars between the bank and the Government; no more Andrew Jacksons to slay the monster. We shall have a popular Government in form, but a money Government in fact; and New York will be the seat of empire. This scheme of uniting all the State Governments as stockholders with the General Government and individuals, would render it much more formidable than the late Bank of the United States (powerful as it was) had ever been.

But this new bank was to be a paper bank. This he inferred from the fact that the Senator, in his plan, had entirely omitted to require that the bank should keep in its vaults any proportion of specie either to the amount of its circulation, or to that of its circulation and deposites combined. In the whole projet there was no allusion to gold and silver. As a substitute, he might presume, the Senator had introduced, with commendation, that provision of the late New York law which required the banks under it to invest a portion of their capital in stocks, for the purpose of redeeming their notes in circulation. Mr. B. feared that this New York scheme would prove the greatest humbug of modern times. If we were to learn any thing from the lights of experience in England, this would prove to be the result.

The power to create and to circulate a paper currency was one of the highest attributes of sovereignty. Whenever in exercising this power you departed from the only true standard of value throughout the world, and established a banking institution without proportioning the amount of its current coin to that of its current notes and deposites, you were at sea without chart or compass. The rule in the Bank of England was one for three of its circulation and deposites, and no man in that country had ever, to his knowledge, contended that this proportion of bullion was too large. The theorem now established by the experience of England was, that the amount of the paper currency ought to fluctuate precisely as the metallic currency would fluctuate if there were no bank notes in circulation; and that these fluctuations should be regulated by the changing condition of the foreign exchanges. When excessive banking, speculation and over-trading existed, and domestic articles rose, in consequence, to such a price as to prevent their exportation, and to endanger or to produce the export of bullion in their stead, then the paper circulation ought to be contracted so as to equalize the exchanges. This was now the rule in England. Nay, more: it was now believed there that the Bank of England was not a fit repository of the sovereign power to regulate the paper currency of the country according to this standard. Its interest, as a bank, was always to increase the circulation, whilst its duty, as a regulator of the currency, was often to diminish it; and it had been loudly condemned for sacrificing its duty to its interest. The plan there now was either to create a bank of issue merely, for the sole purpose of regulating the paper currency by the standard of the foreign exchanges, or to appoint commissioners under the Government to regulate the issues of the Bank of England according to this standard. This plan included the suppression of all joint stock and private banks, as banks of issue; so that there should be but one bank of issue throughout the kingdom.

It was found by experience, on a late memorable occasion, during the year 1836 that the Bank of England, with an actual capital of about seventy millions of dollars, had wholly failed in the attempt to curtail the issues of the joint stock and private banks. In proportion as she contracted, they expanded; and her diminished issue was more than supplied by their increase. This proved, by the way, how wholly incompetent the Senator's Bank of the United States would be to regulate the issues of the State banks. All this experience was to be disregarded, and instead of apportioning the paper curreney of the country to its specie; instead of making the sign bear some reasonable proportion to the thing signified; instead of regulating its amount by our foreign exchanges, we were to adopt the new rule of New York, and to make bank notes the representative of State stocks. Even in New York they had required eleven pence in the dollar to be held in specie; but the Senator's project did not even contain this restriction. The end of all under the new system, would probably be that the paper currency of the country would be expanded to a more enormous extent than it had even yet been; the prices of every domestic article would rise to such a pitch that it would be profitable to export nothing, unless it might be cotton, and to import every thing—the foreign exchanges would thus necessarily be against us—the eleven pence in the dollar would soon be drawn from the vaults of the banks for exportation, and the holders of these notes would be compelled to resort to a suit in chancery to have the States stocks held by the banks converted into specie for their redemption. Should a Bank of the United States be ever established, as he trusted it never might, it ought to be founded upon far different principles. Above all, care should be taken so to regulate and restrict its charter, if that were possible, that it might at all times be able to redeem its notes in specie.

The Senator had said that, during the whole period of forty years, whilst the old and the new Bank of the United States were in existence, they had regulated the domestic exchanges of the country in perfection. Now, said Mr. B. under the pressure of existing evils, we are prone to believe that every thing had been comparatively good in former days. Under this impression he had recently examined into the condition of our domestic exchanges under the reign of the old and the new Bank, and somewhat to his astonishment had found that they were as much, or nearly as much, deranged during those periods, as in almost any other portion of our history. The issues of the State banks had not been controlled, nor the depreciation of their notes prevented, by either Bank of the United States. Had he anticipated this debate, he should have brought some of these statements with him to the Senate.

The Senator believed that the power of Congress to establish a bank had been settled by former precedents in such a manner that it ought no longer to be contested. He differed entirely from him on this question. Whilst the old Bank existed, sanctioned as it was both by legislative and judicial authority, it became the duty of every good citizen to submit to the law which created it, no matter what may have been his individual opinion as to its constitutionality. But the old charter had expired, and the question was to be brought before a new Congress which had never decided it. Shall we then be the slaves of authority, and blindly submit to former precedents, or shall we not be permitted to exercise our own judgment, and ask where was the provision in the Constitution which sanctioned these precedents? He, for one, should be glad to see the gentleman point it out. Where did this power lurk? The Senator had already acknowledged that it was not to be found either in the power to regulate commerce or to coin money. In this particular he differed from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] If the Senator from Kentucky could find it any where, it must be in the power to levy and collect taxes, and to pay the debts of the United States. This was the clause on which the Supreme Court mainly relied; and they merely decided that if Congress believed a Bank of the United States to be a necessary and proper means of collecting the revenue and paying the debts of the country, it was for us to determine that question; and that, unless in an extreme case, the Judiciary ought not to declare such a decision of Congress to be a violation of the Constitution. The Supreme Court have therefore referred it to Congress to decide whether a bank be a necessary and proper means of executing the taxing and debt-paying power. And can any man say, at the present day, that the dues of the Government cannot be conveniently collected, and its debts paid, without the agency of a Bank of the United States? The very decision of the Supreme Court on which the Senator relied, had thus referred this question to Congress, and declared that we, and not they, were the appropriate judges, unless in extreme cases, of the necessity of creating a National Bank. Under the Constitution, Congress have nothing to do either with the regulation of the foreign or domestic exchanges. The power to create a bank, if it existed at all, was to be found in the taxing power and there alone.

To be the slaves of precedent in such a case would be to abandon the cause of human liberty. Every new precedent would be a new and impregnable bulwark against the rights of the people, from which fresh assaults might be made and new victories achieved, until at last the commentaries upon the Constitution would destroy its text, and render us a consolidated people. Why, sir, the judiciary decided the sedition law to be constitutional, and our citizens were tried, condemned, and punished, under its provisions. Would the Senator contend that this precedent should bind the consciences of members of Congress, and compel them to admit, in all future time, that a new sedition law would be constitutional? Certainly not. At this very session, the Senate, without any opposition, had determined to refund a fine inflicted under the old sedition law by the Judiciary, solely upon the principle, as he believed, that it was unconstitutional. But it was not his intention to enter fully into the argument of this question. He had risen merely to make a few suggestions in relation to the location and some of the features of the gentleman's bank.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Powell: read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill referred to it making appropriations for the naval service for 1838, and gave notice that he should call it up to-morrow morning, at an early hour.

Mr. TIPTON, on leave, introduced a bill to remove the office of the Surveyor General for Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin: read twice, and referred.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia for twenty years.

The question being on Mr. NILES's amendment, making the president and directors of the respective banks personally responsible for all losses to the community on the winding up of the banks—

The question was put, and the amendment lost without a debate, and without a division.

Mr. BENTON said, with the permission of the Senate, he would modify the substitute offered by himself for the original bill. If adopted, it would save much of the time of the Senate. The change he had reference to, was merely in relation to the dates; he had consulted several members, and he believed his present proposition would not only meet the views of the Senate generally, but he believed it would be acceptable to those most interested. The conditions imposed were such as could not be objected to he thought. They were—

1. That they should cease receiving or paying out of all paper for currency of a less denomination than five dollars, on or before the promulgation of this act.

2. That they should cease paying out the notes of other banks from and after the 1st of October next.

3. That they should redeem in specie all their notes of five dollars and under, from and after the 1st of August next.

4. That they should redeem all their notes in full, in specie, from and after the 1st of January, 1839.

Mr. HUBBARD said he would very much prefer the proposition offered by himself on a former occasion. He was averse to the renewal of their charters being restricted by the conditions imposed by the Senator. He thought it would be better to leave them free and independent in their action, and charter them during the pleasure of Congress, subject to its will.

Mr. WRIHT spoke at some length against the original bill, he could not reconcile it to his views of right, to renew these charters for twenty years, when they were in open violation of the laws, and had long since forfeited their charters by their own acts. He greatly preferred the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] Why even give them an extension of two years, unless you impose these wholesome restrictions? Did any Senator desire to protect them in the open violation of their charters in the issue of notes of less denomination than $5? Were we calling upon them too soon for the redemption of their small notes, or for a general redemption of all their notes? He wished Senators to look at the restrictions proposed, and ask themselves if they were too severe. Much had been said in that body of of an irredeemable paper; it was what was condemned by all, and proper efforts should be made to put an end to it. The Senator from New Hampshire says he would prefer a charter at the pleasure of Congress. He knew the Senator's reasons, which he believed would be considered most ameliorating; but in his, Mr. W's mind, it would be the very worst course that could be pursued; and if once adopted, their charters would never be reached again. Let us extend no greater limits to these institutions than the States generally do to theirs, and this we have done.

Mr. HUBBARD then contended that his proposition would be preferable, that if the banks were left to the action of Congress, their charters dependent on its will, they would be less likely to do any thing that would bring on them the condemnation of that body or of the citizens.

Mr. ROANE defended the bill as originally drafted. The committee had endeavored to draw all the light they could around them in relation to the most approved system of banking. In reply to a remark he had heard, that we knew nothing of the condition of these banks, he could state that they had been subject to a severe and rigid scrutiny, the result of which was before the Senate, and he trusted the bill would be permitted to pass without further discussion.

Mr. BENTON thought as much indulgence was granted in the substitute as was reasonable and just. The charters were already forfeited and lying at our mercy. Six banks in this District were circulating money which would ultimately fail in the hands of the poor laborer. He would not vote for any thing not coupled with the restrictions he proposed.

Mr. DAVIS opposed the substitute as containing provisions calculated to destroy the business of the banks, in relation to paying out the notes of other institutions.

Mr. TIPTON spoke earnestly in favor of placing the people of the District above the embarrassing uncertainty with which they had heretofore been agitated in relation to their banks. He desired the Senate to decide promptly whether they would do so or not; and, with this view, he should vote against all amendments to this bill.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, spoke in favor of the amendment, and in opposition to a recharter for twenty years, that Congress might revise the present system, or make a better.

Mr. NORVELL said, that he had an amendment to submit to the amendment proposed to the bill by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr BENTON.] The amendment of that Senator extended the charters of the banks of the District two years, on the condition that they should redeem their five dollar bills, from and after the first of August, with gold or silver, and their bills of all denominations from the first of January next. Now, he was very willing, and indeed anxious, to extend the charters or these banks agreeably to their existing provisions. By these provisions the banks were required at all times to redeem their notes with specie, and were forbidden to issue notes under the denomination of five dollars. In consequence of the suspension of specie payments by the banks in the different States, the District banks, from what appeared to be an unavoidable necessity, were also compelled to suspend. He was very willing, tacitly, to acquiesce a while longer in this necessity, and to renew the charters of all these banks, without any express reference, in the renewal, to their departure from the specie standard. But, when brought to vote directly on the question, whether their suspension of specie payments shall receive the formal sanction of this body, as it would, if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri should be adopted, he must vote against it. He could never consent to give his sanction, by a formal vote, to a course of this kind, however much he might be disposed to acquiesce in it. He would not divide the principle of specie payments into parts, as the amendment proposed, and vote to sanction their failure for a time, on the condition that the banks should resume at a future distant day. He asked how Senators on this side of the hall, who had, during the whole of the extra and this session, spoken and voted against the banks for suspending specie payments, could now turn round and give their direct sanction to this suspension? He would cheerfully go with them in renewing the charters of the District banks, without saying any thing about their suspension; but he could not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. He would, therefore, move to amend that amendment so that the charters of these banks should be extended as proposed, provided they redeemed their bills, of all denominations, with gold or silver, from and after the day on which the act is to take effect, and provided further that their charters should be null and void, if they failed so to redeem their bills. He submitted this motion with reluctance, and solely in consequence of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. He would prefer the extension of the charters according to their existing provisions, which required all that could or need be required in relation to specie payments.

Mr. KING said it was utterly impossible for them to do so at present. If it was the intention of his friend from Michigan to destroy these institutions, it was well. He certainly had taken a most effectual mode; but as he presumed that was not the motive of the honorable Senator, nor to prolong a discussion already too protracted, he hoped the amendment would be withdrawn.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped the Senator from Michigan would not persist in his amendment, as it would be ruinous to the banks of the District.

Mr. NORVELL repeated the considerations which had induced his motion. So far from desiring to injure the District banks, he wished to see their charters renewed, and would cheerfully vote for the bill with one or two modifications, by no means unfavorable to them, reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. He would, however, as his friends from Alabama and Pennsylvania had requested it, withdraw his amendment, and content himself with voting against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out the four clauses in the proviso of Mr. BENTON's amendment, and insert a provision that the present charters should be extended during the pleasure of Congress, being in the mean time subject to any modifications Congress might think proper to make, and subject also to a repeal, at the discretion of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN would not go for the proposition of the Senator; it would amount to a perpetual charter. He was not for destroying these banks; on the contrary, he was for sustaining them so long as they adhered to what was right and correct.

Mr. KING expressed an earnest desire to bring this matter to a close. The bill before them was vastly superior, because it contained many salutary provisions. If gentlemen were so desirous to narrow down the time, why not take the bill as it was, and limit the duration to a shorter period. While up, he would take occasion to vindicate the banks from aspersions which had been thrown upon them at different times during the discussion. If gentlemen would look to New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, where banks with immense capital were forced to yield to the pressure, how could corporations like them, with small capital, hold out. The fact was, to the last moment, they did their best, and should not now be forced into measures which would be oppressive to them, and distressing to the citizens of the District. He would vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri with great reluctance, and he did so with a view of giving time, under the hope that a better temper and spirit would prevail in relation to the matter.

Mr. BAYARD thought a limited period would be better than an indefinite one.

Mr. STRANGE thought, of all the dangerous propositions ever entertained, that suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] was the most so. Was not every member of Congress exposed to the temptations of these banks—nay, the very President himself might be amenable to corruption, through the veto. He did not pretend to say that such things would be; sufficient for him was the opinion that they might be. He did not believe with the Senator from Kentucky that the Bank of the United States had never interfered in the elections; on the contrary, he believed that it had exercised a very dangerous influence. He agreed with the Senator from Michigan, that we should not countenance institutions that were daily flying in the face of law and right. He would vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as best calculated to place them in a position to secure the interests of the community, without violating their chartered privileges.

Mr. BENTON was certain that, if the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire prevailed, the banks would run on until they settled down, as the pleasure of Congress would be the pleasure of members of Congress. Suppose a member of Congress wanted a discount, while an industrious mechanic or merchant of the District required one at the same time—the bank could not accommodate both, and what then would be the result. The directors would say if we do not oblige the member we shall lose the bank. Do not gentlemen see that the bank could not be a free agent. The banks themselves and the people of the District ought to be opposed to it. I look upon it, said Mr. B. as one of the most objectionable measures ever presented to Congress.

Mr. HUBBARD said, as his amendment seemed to find no favor in the eyes of either the friends or enemies of the bill, he would withdraw it; but he still believed it the most wholesome and proper that could be adopted.

The question now recurring on Mr. BENTON's amendment,

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to modify it by requiring that the District banks should resume sooner than the 1st of January, 1839, if the principal banks in Baltimore and Richmond should sooner resume.

Mr. BENTON accepted this modification.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the second clause of Mr. BENTON's proviso, relating to the notes of other banks, was stricken out.

The question was then put on Mr. BENTON's substitute for the bill, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Wuliams, Wright and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton and Webster—16.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed—yeas 37, nays 2.

The bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and the bill to revive, with amendments, the "Act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," were severally considered and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, May 22, 1838.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved that a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, covering a plan for the construction of safe buildings for the Surveyors General in the States be printed, and the maps accompanying the same be lithographed, which was agreed to.

Mr. STONE, on leave, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Kellysville, in Marion county, Tennessee, crossing the Tennessee river at Lawrie's Old Ferry, passing by Nickajack, Gardenhires, thence up Running Water Creek, crossing the Racoon mountain into the Lookout Valley to some point at or near Squirrel Town, in Dade county, Georgia.

Mr. HAYNES, on leave, presented a memorial for a mail route.

Mr. CONNOR asked leave to offer a resolution ordering the daily hour of meeting of the House hereafter to be 10 o'clock, a. m.

Objection being made, Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 127, nays 42.

So the rules were suspended, and the resolution being before the House,

Mr. BOON moved to add that the House take a daily recess from 2 till ½ past 3 o'clock.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was himself opposed to any recess, but if they were to have it, he suggested the usual period, from ½ past 2 till 4 o'clock.

Mr. REED hoped the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. McKENNON was opposed to it, for he thought six hours long enough to remain there in a confined atmosphere.

Mr. BOON modified his amendment according to the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, from ½ past 2 till 4 o'clock. He added that he had made the motion in obedience to the expressed wishes of several gentlemen.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said as he was opposed to a recess, he would move the previous question, which was seconded—93 to 70—and the main question being ordered, was put and agreed to, and the resolution adopted without amendment.

REPEAL OF THE SPECIE CIRCULAR.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky asked leave to make a statement in reference to what had been said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BOON] yesterday.

Leave being granted,

Mr. W. went on to say that he was not present when the gentleman made his statement, and though he did not say that the gentleman had inaccurately detailed the private conversation between them, yet he would take occasion to rectify an error that had got into the newspapers, and been circulating for the last two or three weeks. It was stated that Mr. W. had consented, or given notice that he would consent, to accept the resolution of Mr. BOON as a modification or substitute for his own, should the rules be suspended to give him an opportunity of doing so. Mr. W. never said so, and the newspapers were mistaken. The gentleman from Indiana would bear him witness that he said no such thing, and gave no such pledge. Yesterday morning, when the gentleman and himself could not agree, either upon his resolution or Mr. W's, Mr. W. remarked that he would take the one that had been printed and laid on their tables—he believed it came from the Senate—and if the rules were suspended, he would so modify it. Upon further examination, however, M. W. found that it materially differed from the object they both seemed to have in view; and he, therefore, notified the gentleman from Indiana that he should not offer it; adding further that, as his great object was to do away with all distinctions now existing in the kind of moneys received for the public dues, he was desirous of doing every thing in his power to accommodate all sides of the House. He was willing to make it a joint resolution, and he then said, and again pledged himself, that, if the rules were suspended, he would frame the resolution, at the suggestion of any gentleman, to accomplish the object of those who wanted to see the specie circular repealed. He would make any modification that would be thought generally acceptable to the House.

Mr. W. explained the reason why he had not called up his resolution before, that he thought they got along much better by taking up the business in its regular order; besides his resolution was submitted only a day or two before the duelling report came in, and, as a privileged question, that cut off every thing else, and took up two or three weeks; and moreover he was not disposed to arrest the public business of the House. Mr. W. then sent his modification to the Chair, which was read, and he moved the House to take it up.

Objection being made, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. BOON then asked leave to make a further statement, but it was objected to.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative—yeas 104, nays 83.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayerigg, Bell, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Casey, Cheatham, Childs, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Peck, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, John Robertson, Edward W. Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Yell, and Yorke—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Bouldin, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Glascock, Grant, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Martin, McKay, Robt. McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Moore, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Potter, Pratt, Prentiss, Reily, Sawyer, Sheffer, Charles Shepard, Sheplor, Spencer, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vanderveer, Webster, Weeks, Jared W. Williams, and Worthington—83.

So the House refused.

Mr. NAYLOR, on leave, presented a petition.

Mr. HUNTER, of Ohio, moved to print the report of the survey of the harbor of Sandusky, in that State, which was sent in from the Topographical Bureau yesterday, and the motion was agreed to nem diss.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of ——— Keller.

Also, a bill to continue in force the act of 1837, to provide for the payment of horses and other property, lost, or destroyed, in the military service of the United States.

Mr. W. moved that it be made the order for this day, which was agreed to; and the House went instanter into committee thereon, Mr. REED in the chair.

Mr. WHITTLESEY having briefly explained its provisions and the necessity of its passage.

Mr. GRAHAM complained that the bill did not extend far enough, and that as meritorious a class of claimants were excluded from its benefits as that embraced in its provisions. Mr. G. then moved an amendment, extending the benefits of the bill to the mounted rangers of Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, if it was intended to press this amendment, he should be compelled to move the rising of the committee, so as to discuss it another time, because the House agreed to go into committee, merely to consider the original bill as reported. Moreover, Mr. W. was prepared to make a report on the subject referred to by Mr. GRAHAM, in response to a resolution introduced some time since by that gentleman.

Mr. YELL suggested to the gentleman from Indiana, as there were other States interested, either to make his proposed provision general, or at least to include Arkansas. If he did neither, Mr. Y. should vote against the admendment.

Mr. GRAHAM assented to the first suggestion, and made his amendment general, so as to include all mounted rangers. Mr. G. then entered into the details, and set forth the services and claims of this class of men upon the Government.

Mr. WHITTLESEY appealed to the gentleman to permit the question to be taken, or suffer the committee to rise, for if he had thought a long debate was to have sprung up, he most assuredly would not have asked the indulgence of the House to go into committee upon this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM, however, declined to yield, and went on to advocate his amendment, and then before the question was taken,

Mr. HOFFMAN moved that the committee rise, which being agreed to, the committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following message, received from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The accompanying copy of a communication addressed to the Secretary of War by the Cherokee delegation is submitted to Congress, in order that such measures may be adopted as are required to carry into effect the benevolent intentions of the Government towards the Cherokee nation, and which it is hoped will induce them to remove peaceably and contentedly to their new homes in the West. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, May 21, 1838.

The message having been read,

Mr. OWENS called for the reading of the accompanying documents; which being done,

Mr. BELL moved the reference of the whole to a Committee on the Union, and that they be printed.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House passed to the orders of the day.

After some conversation between Mr. EVERETT and Mr. CAMBRELENG, the latter of whom stating that the above papers involved a new question,

Mr. GLASCOCK moved a vote of reconsideration, so as to refer them to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and gave his reasons therefor.

Mr. HAYNES was in favor of the latter reference.

Mr. EVERETT advocated a reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOWARD preferred the original reference to the Committee on the Union, inasmuch as the subject was already before that body, on the amendments to the bill to prevent and suppress Indian hostilities.

Mr. HOLSEY advocated the reference to the Indian Committee, for he could not consent to embarrass the above bill by bringing on a protracted discussion upon the validity of the Cherokee treaty. Mr. H. apprehended hostilities, and alluded to a murder that had already taken place.

Mr. REED insisted that the reference already made was the proper one, and he moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. OWENS expressed a hope that the gentleman would not press that motion.

Mr. HOLSEY asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered, and the motion was rejected—ayes 65, noes 68.

Mr. BELL knew nothing to be gained by the reference of the subject to the Committee on Indian Affairs, for there was not the slightest ground to believe that that committee would bring in any proposition. They would do nothing, but say "hands off." He was sorry the murder had been alluded to, for there were no facts to show that it evinced a determination on the part of the Indians to commence hostilities. As to voting money, Mr. B. was willing to vote all that was now and would be necessary, even to-day if it was thought expedient; but it would be useless to refer it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union must eventually act upon it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG adverted to the importance of the President's communication, which contained several distinct propositions, all of which came within the province of the standing Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into, and gave other reasons for giving the subject that direction.

Mr. CUSHING expressed himself willing to yield the floor on the Northwest boundary question to go on with the Indian hostility bill.

The motion to reconsider was then agreed to—ayes 73, noes 69.

The question then again recurring on the commitment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was decided in the negative, by tellers—ayes 72, noes 84.

On sending it to the Committee on Indian Affairs,

Mr. EVERETT moved to add the following instructions:

"And that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. DAWSON assured all parties that if they expected to make any thing politically out of this question they were very much mistaken. Where could be the necessity, or what good could result out of sending for persons and papers to investigate the validity of a treaty long since ratified and confirmed? What! were they to suffer John Ross to arrest and change the whole action of this Government? Mr. D. had labored day and night to bring this man to a reasonable proposition, but he had no sooner succeeded than in a hour afterwards he withdrew, or changed his opinion.

Mr. D. said the only proper course for the House to pursue was to disobey and disregard the President's recommendations, which were in effect to declare war against the people of Georgia. He, therefore, moved to lay the whole subject on the table, but withdrew that motion at the request of Mr. WISE, who hoped this communication would be considered, and said he would pay the first compliment to the President he had ever paid in his life, for his propositions were a virtual acknowledgment that the pretended treaty was no treaty, as Mr. W. had often before alleged. He rejoiced that the Executive of the United States had at last signified a wish to do justice to the Cherokees. Mr. W. pursuant to his pledge to Mr. DAWSON, renewed that gentleman's motion to lay the whole subject on the table, but withdrew it by his assent.

Mr. GLASCOCK addressed the House with earnestness, insisting on the obligation of the treaty of 1835, and the sacredness of the vested rights of Georgia under it; the certainty that her citizens would take possession of these lands, and the imminent danger of an Indian war. Should the Government attempt to overturn that treaty, Georgia would never be found wanting to herself, as she had once before proved. And he would say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] that his bold threats about castigating his State into submission, had no terrors for him or the people he in part represented. This was not the first time that such threats had been made against Georgia, growing out of the Indian treaties; but she always took her stand, and assumed her position under them, and was not to be forced from it. She ever remained firm, as she will now, amidst all the calumnies and foul slanders which have been eagerly circulated to her injury, and unawed by every attempt of those who, under the sacred garb of religion and humanity, seek to array against her public feeling and indignation.

Sir, said Mr. G., she plants herself upon those rights secured and guarantied to her under the treaty of 1835—a treaty solemnly ratified, and having all the sanctions and requisites requir'd by the Constitution, and now the supreme law of the land; and such rights, thus secured, gentlemen of all parties might rest assured Georgia at least would peril her all to maintain and defend. Independent of this, said Mr. G., a large portion of his constituents had rights vested in them under this treaty, and by special enactments of their own Legislature—rights to the possession and occupancy of their lands; and they, too, stand ready to resist, "even unto death," all encroachments upon them, coming from what quarter they may. And he could assure the gentleman from Virginia, that if such contests should ever be made necessary, however unequal and unpleasant, they would never falter. They had the firmness and the courage, on the one hand, to maintain their own rights under the treaty; and, on the other, the magnanimity to protect and defend the Indians in theirs. Sir, they stand upon the treaty; and all they ask at the hands of the Government is a speedy enforcement of its provisions. They now ask it through their representatives, and they have a right to expect it.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, JUNE 4, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 26.

[We hope to furnish Mr. G's remarks at length in a few days, as well as those of other gentlemen.]

Mr. ATHERTON then rose and demanded the previous question, as it was apparent that a protracted discussion was growing out of this preliminary motion of reference.

Mr. OWENS hoped the gentleman would withdraw that motion, and permit the question to be taken on laying the subject on the table.

After some conversation between the CHAIR, and Messrs. WISE and McKAY, as to the reading of the papers again,

Mr. OWENS moved to lay the subject on the table, and called for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were yeas 39, nays 113, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bouldin, Bynum, Connor, Craig, Crockett, Dawson, Elmore, Fry, Glascock, James Graham, Gray, Griffin, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Howard, R. M. T. Hunter, Kennedy, Martin, McKay, Montgomery, Moore, Murray, Owens, Palmer, Petrikin, Pickens, Potter, Rencher, Richardson, Sawyer, Charles Shepard, Shields, Stone, Thomas, Thompson, Towns, Turney, and Yell—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Aycrigg, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Bond, Bronson, Cambreleng, W. B. Carter, Casey, Chapman, Childs, Coles, Corwin, Cushing, Cushman, Davies, Deberry, De Graff, Dromgoole, Dunn, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Fairfield, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, J. Garland, R. Garland, W. Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Halstead, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Herod, Holt, Edward B. Hubley, Samuel Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Daniel Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Keim, Gouverneur Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, Samson Mason, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Mathias Morris, Naylor, Noble, Parmenter, Patterson, Peck, Pennybacker, Phelps, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Reily, Ridgway, Rives, John Robertson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Shaffer, Augustine H. Shepherd, Sheplor, Sibley, Southgate, Stanly, Stratton, Taylor, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Vail, Wagener, Webster, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Jared W. Williams, Wise, and Yorke—113.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

The question recurring on the demand for the previous question,

Mr. MONTGOMERY said he hoped this subject would be settled, temporarily at least, without further excitement; and he appealed to his friend from New Hampshire to withdraw his motion for the previous question, to enable Mr. M. to move its postponement for one week.

Mr. ATHERTON not assenting to the request, the House passed between the tellers, and seconded the previous question—78 to 53; so the main question was ordered, put, and agreed to.

So the subject was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

OREGON TERRITORY.

The House then resumed the consideration of the President's message in relation to the occupation by the British of our Northwestern Territory, the question being on the motion to commit it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CUSHING resumed and concluded his remarks on the subject generally, and in favor of his motion to commit, with certain instructions.

Mr. HOWARD addressed the House for some time, partly in reply to Mr. CUSHING.

Mr. ELMORE said this was a question of great importance, and, for one, was not disposed that the action of the House should be predicated upon the limited and contracted instructions to the committee prepared by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] He would therefore with a view of drawing out more important and extended information, moved to strike out all after the word "instructions," and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"Also, to inquire into the extent of the country claimed by the United States west of the Rocky Mountains, and on the northwest coast on the Pacific ocean, the titles under which it is claimed, and the evidence of the correctness of that title; the extent of the sea coast, and the number and description of its harbors; the nature of the climate, soil, productions, and trade; and, also, whether it is expedient to establish a Territorial Government, or one or more military posts as protection for the same, or any part thereof, and what will be the expense necessary to establish the same, and the annual expense for its support; what fortifications and ships will be required for said Territory, and what number of soldiers and sailors will be necessary for its protection, both in time of peace and in case of war with any foreign power, and that the committee report thereon to this House."

Mr. CUSHING said he did not object to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina; but thought that the object could be accomplished, if he would move it as an addition to Mr. C's, and then he would be willing to accept it as a modification.

Mr. ELMORE having assented to this suggestion, the question was taken upon the adoption of the instructions, and thus modified they were agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion to commit the report with the instructions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ELMORE said before the question was taken, it was his desire to make some remarks upon the proposition and the subject generally, but did not feel prepared at that time, and he therefore moved an adjournment; which motion prevailed, and so

The House adjourned.

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, his private secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

The accompanying copy of a communication addressed to the Secretary of War by the Cherokee delegation is submitted to Congress, in order that such measures may be adopted as are required to carry into effect the benevolent intentions of the Government towards the Cherokee nation, and which it is hoped will induce them to remove peaceably and contentedly to their new homes in the West. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, May 21, 1838

To Messrs. JOHN ROSS, EDWARD GUNTER, R. TAYLOR, JAMES BROWN, SAMUEL GUNTER, SITUWAHER, ELIJAH HICKS, and WHITE PATH, Cherokee Delegation.

The undersigned has attentively considered the project of a treaty submitted by you, and, although equally desirous with yourselves to satisfy that portion of the nation that still remain east of the Mississippi, and to offer them every inducement to remove peaceably and contentedly to their new homes in the West, and not unwilling to grant most of the terms proposed by you, still, where the rights and just expectations of sovereign States are involved, it is deemed inexpedient, without their consent, to give to any stipulations which affect them the form of a solemn treaty.

In the first article you desire to stipulate and agree that "the said Cherokee nation, party hereto, engages and stipulates to remove from all the lands now occupied by them eastward of the Mississippi, and hereby renounces and relinquishes to the United States all claim of every description to such lands; such removal to be commenced at the earliest convenient period, and to be fully completed within two years from this date; to be effected by the Cherokees themselves and by their agents, and the entire expenses of such removal to be defrayed out of the money to be paid by the United States, as hereinafter provided." As has been before observed, the Government of the United States could not agree to this act without the consent of the States whose rights are involved, and whose interests may be affected by this stipulation; but the Executive pledges itself to use its best efforts to induce them to abstain from pressing their claims in a manner that would produce loss or inconvenience to the Cherokee people, and would be inconsistent with their being removed with every reasonable comfort. From the well known humanity and generous character of the States of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina, there can be no doubt of their granting every indulgence which the interests of humanity require; and if two years are necessary for the comfortable removal of the nation, the undersigned will venture to assure the delegation that their request will be granted.

If it be desired by the Cherokee nation that their own agents should have the charge of their emigration, their wishes will be complied with, and instructions be given to the commanding general in the Cherokee country to enter into arrangements with them to that effect. With regard to the expense of this operation, which you ask may be defrayed by the United States, in the opinion of the undersigned, the request ought to be granted, and an application for such further sum as may be required for this purpose shall be made to Congress.

In the next article of your project, you propose that "the United States, on their part, stipulate and agree, in consideration of the premises, to perfect the title of the Cherokee nation to the lands and territory westward of the Mississippi, described, mentioned, and defined in and by the treaty of 1833, between the United States and the Cherokees west of the Mississippi, and the privilege of outlet thereto annexed, and to issue a patent therefor to the Cherokee nation in perpetuity; and further to pay the said chiefs and representatives of the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi, the sum of —— dollars, in manner and at the time hereinafter provided."

It was always the declared intention of the Government to perfect the title to this land to the Cherokee nation, and to issue a patent therefor, so soon as that portion of them now east of the Mississippi had emigrated west, granting the nation the privilege of outlet thereto annexed, and all other privileges secured to them by former arrangements. Nor will it object to grant them, in perpetuity, if Congress should think proper to do so on their recommendation, under certain restrictions, to which the delegation have assented. As the delegation expressed their fears that a form of Government might be imposed which they were neither prepared for nor desirous of, the assurance is hereby repeated, that no form of Government will be imposed upon the Cherokees without the consent of the whole nation, given in council; nor shall their country be created into a Territory, without such previous concurrence.

With regard to the payment of a further sum of money by the United States, the undersigned cannot consent to recommend such a measure to Congress. The Senate of the United States deliberately decided that five millions of dollars was a full and sufficient indemnity to the Cherokees for the lands they relinquished on the east side of the Mississippi; and it is understood that the members of that body see no reason at present to alter that decision.

In the third act of your project you ask that "the said Cherokee nation, party hereto, through and by their acknowledged chiefs and officers, shall have the entire control, management, and disposition, responsible only to their own nation, of the funds to be paid under this treaty."

The undersigned would very much prefer making this disposition of the funds of the nation, but as the interests of those Cherokees who have lately emigrated, are deeply involved in this proposition, the Executive cannot recommend such an alternative without the previous consent of all the parties concerned.

The next article asks, "that in addition to the said sum mentioned in the foregoing second article, the United States shall forthwith pay, or arrange to be paid, to the Cherokee nation, party hereto, the arrearages of the annuities which were provided for in the treaty of 1819, up to this date, and shall continue such annuities during the two years allowed for said removal."

The undersigned assures the delegation, that whatever arrearages or annuities are due to the Cherokee nation, under the treaty of 1819, shall be promptly paid up to this date, and a continuance of that annuity for two years longer shall be asked of Congress.

The 5th article requires "that inasmuch as the Cherokees contemplate removing as provided for in said first article, as rapidly as their numbers and engagements will permit, the United States stipulate and engage to pay to them, as such removal, and the necessary preparations therefor progress, out of the money mentioned in said second article, such sums as may from time to time be necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto."

All payments and necessary advances for the purposes herein set forth will be liberally provided for in the contract which the commanding general will be authorized to make with the Cherokee agents for the emigration of that portion of the nation east of the Mississippi.

The 6th article asks "that during the period prescribed and allowed by this treaty for said removal, the United States stipulate and contract to protect the persons and property of said Cherokees from all acts of encroachment and violence, and to furnish them when required, with the necessary escort and protection, during such removal, until their arrival at their destination beyond the Mississippi."

The necessary escort and protection, during the removal of the Cherokees, until their arrival at their destination beyond the Mississippi, will be furnished, and the United States will protect the persons and property of the said Cherokees from all illegal acts of encroachment and violence, and will use their best efforts with the States interested to prevent their pressing the execution of their rights in a manner calculated to oppress or inconvenience any individual of the nation.

In the eighth article the request is made, "That in addition to the moneys herein before stipulated to be paid by the United States, they further agree to pay to the said Cherokee nation, party hereto, the gross sum of —— dollars, in full discharge of all claims upon the United States, under the stipulations of former treaties, for public and private property, spoliations, indemnities, and other reclamations, whether national or individual, and for reimbursement of expenses incurred in and about this arrangement.

Six hundred thousand dollars was set apart for this purpose by a vote of Congress, and to defray the expenses of the removal of the nation to their new homes. But as this sum proves to be inadequate for both objects, the Executive will recommend to Congress to make a further appropriation, in order to satisfy them.

The undersigned trusts that the Cherokee delegation will see in these liberal concessions the earnest desire of the President to reconcile the nation to the necessity of removing without any other delay than a due regard for their comfort and convenience demands; and in this conviction, confidently relies upon the cordial co-operation of the chiefs and headmen to effect this desirable object.

On the part of the Government, copies of this document, with suitable aplications to the States interested, will be immediately transmitted to the several Governors thereof; instructions will be sent to the commanding general to act in conformity with its assurances, and a communication be made to Congress, asking the consent of that body to the provisions proposed for the benefit of the Cherokee nation.

The undersigned, in closing this communication, which has been considered with great deliberation, and drawn with the utmost regard for the wishes of the delegation, desires it to be distinctly understood that it contains the most liberal terms the Executive can grant, with a due regard to the rights and interests of all the parties concerned; and therefore presents it as the final determination of the Government, and the peremptory conclusion of the correspondence with the Cherokee deputation on this subject. J. R. POINSETT.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
May 18, 1838.

The message and accompanying document having been read—

Mr. KING observed that he had glanced his eye over the document transmitted by the Executive in his message of this morning, and he could not but regret that such a paper had been laid before the Senate. In the absence of all information on his part as to the leading motive of the Secretary of War in making that communication, he was at a loss to know what disposition to make of it. It appeared to him that it was a most unfortunate and ill-judged measure; and that consequences of the most injurious character might grow out of it. It was not the time now to say any thing as to the character of that paper; but he would observe that there was no evidence that the Cherokee delegation here was disposed to accept the terms proposed by the Secretary. It appeared to him that the delegations of the States more immediately interested in the matter ought to have been consulted; and considering how deeply the interests of those States were involved, that no movement ought to have been made without their sanction. As he had not had time to give to the paper that examination which its importance required, he would move to lay it on the table until he could give it such an examination as would enable him to determine what course to take with regard to it.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, had listened to the document just read with the most profound regret, mingled with surprise. He regretted extremely that it had been thought proper by the Secretary of War (with the approbation of the President, no doubt) to take a step like this without a previous consultation with the delegation of either of the States that were so deeply interested in this important subject. As respected the delegations from Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina, he had no knowledge, and therefore could not say whether they had been consulted in the matter; but he would say, that neither his colleague nor himself had had the slightest intimation of what was going forward, and that the first information he had received of it was derived from the paper just read. So far from his being consulted, and prepared for any thing of the kind, the very first thing he did on his arrival in this city, at the commencement of the extra session, was to wait on the Secretary of War, and protest against any interference with the execution of the treaty, and to warn him that it would certainly produce another Indian war, and revive the scenes that had been enacted in Florida.

Sir, said Mr. C. the scenes in Florida ought to have admonished the Secretary of the danger of tampering with a subject of such fearful importance, and that firmness and energy, with a rigid adherence to the terms of the treaty, was the only course to prevent war and bloodshed. This temporizing policy was not the way to preserve the respect of the Indians, or to quiet the minds of our own citizens. The plan of the Secretary supposed that the Executives of Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia might be consulted, and instructions sent to Gen. Scott in time to arrest the execution of the treaty. And under what circumstances? As he had been informed, there had been several recent murders perpetrated on our citizens by these misguided Indians, excited, no doubt, by the delusions held out to them by their leading men here at the seat of Government. He had just learned that the late surveyor general of the State of Georgia had been murdered by Cherokee Indians, and that his ferryman had shared the same fate. Such were the scenes occurring at the very time that the Secretary proposes to interfere with the treaty, and bearing an ominous resemblance to those which ushered in the Florida war. He had hoped that other councils would have governed the Administration, and that this treaty, so necessary to the peace of our citizens, as well as to the preservation of the Indians themselves, and which had been solemnly ratified by both Houses of Congress, would have been fairly executed, and an end put to this distracting subject. He would take the occasion to say, in justice to himself and the people of his State, that the Secretary of War was warned over and over again before the commencement of the Creek war, of the danger of the course he was pursuing, and he was urgently solicited to provide for the protection of the people against Indian violence. Notwithstanding the danger that threatened, he would not even undertake to pay for a detachment of militia raised for that purpose. What was the consequence? Why the Creek war of 1836, which was soon followed by that of 1837. Without profiting by former errors, which had been followed by such disastrous consequences, the Secretary was induced again to falter in carrying into execution a treaty which it was apparent could by no means be got over. And what motive prompted this pretended Cherokee delegation? Why the whole secret of this matter could be learned by the propositions in the third article of the treaty submitted by John Ross, which were, that all moneys due to the nation should be paid to the principal chiefs, to be by them disposed of for the benefit of the tribe. Here was the whole secret. It was to get the control of the money, not for the benefit of the poor Indians, but to enrich John Ross and his associates, while the rest of the tribe were to be ground down to the dust. Under the stipulations of the former treaty, the Indians were dealt with in a more liberal manner. The money was to be fairly distributed, and not to be given to John Ross, who assumes to be the head of the nation, and hence his furious opposition to the treaty. Again: another article of this proposition is, that the Indians are to be protected in their present abodes until the Legislatures of the several States interested can be consulted. The Legislatures of Georgia and Alabama would not be in session till the fall, and in the State of Tennessee there must be a called session, as the Legislature will not meet till October, 1839. Here, then, was to be a postponement for three years of a solemn treaty concurred in by this House and sanctioned by the other; and in the mean time a body of troops is to be kept up, to protect the Indians, though not a word was said, he believed, about protecting the white population. And now he would ask, what sort of force would be required? Why, they must keep up an army to restrain the Indians and white people from coming in conflict with each other. We, said he, have had some experience on the subject. We have had the Cherokee part of Alabama held under martial law, and we have seen a military court martial undertake, in effect, to usurp the functions of our courts of law.

What was the present state of things in that country? General Scott was now there with troops in the field, or shortly to be there, to the amount of 7,000, so that the principal part of the expense of removing these people was already incurred. The militia called out, to the number of 5,000, were already there, or would reach there before any orders from the Secretary of War, countermanding them, could probably get there. Mr. C. regretted exceedingly the step that had been taken. He had told the Secretary frequently that the most dangerous consequences would ensue if the treaty was not carried into effect, and that his duty to his constituents, as well as humanity to the Indians, required that he should lay before him the true state of things in that country.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his regret that this paper was not approved by gentlemen representing the States concerned. Their approbation was very important, as it would have a more favorable effect on the public mind. Mr. W. would now consider only the question of its present disposal; and it struck him that it ought to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. There was a strong and growing feeling in the country that great wrong had been done to the Cherokees by the treaty of New Echota. But Mr. W. would not consider that now. Here was a communication from the Executive, requesting the action of Congress on this subject; and Mr. W. thought the proper course was to refer it to the appropriate committee. He moved, therefore, to refer it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and hoped it would be done without provoking discussion.

Mr. STRANGE thought the discussion rather premature. He would not have risen to say a single word, might he not have been supposed to be remiss with regard to the feelings of the people of his State in relation to the matter. It was true that he, like the Senators from Alabama, had not been consulted, nor did he believe his colleague had, nor was there any intimation given. Whether it was improper on the part of the Secretary not to have done so, he left for others to decide; neither was he prepared to give any decided opinion in relation to the document. His first impressions were such as had already been expressed; but he believed it would be unacceptable to the people of his State, and would create a great deal of unpleasant excitement. He agreed with the Senator from Massachusetts, that the subject ought to be respectfully considered, as well from the importance of the matter as the high source from which it emanated; and he believed the direction indicated by that Senator to be the right one.

Mr. GRUNDY, after a few words which were not heard, said he thought the vote of the Senate had settled for ever the question of the validity of this treaty. With regard to consulting the States interested, the State of Tennessee could not be consulted, for her Legislature would not be in session until a year from next October. The Legislature of that State, at its last session, under the faith of the existing treaty, and believing that it was to be carried into effect unaltered in any of its provisions, had provided for the sale of all the lands within the Indian boundary, within a very short period. The officers and surveyors were all appointed, and the sale was directed to take place for the benefit of the State, and not of the General Government. All the legislation of the State, therefore, in relation to this subject, would be set aside, if the treaty was not carried into effect. For himself, he could only say that the treaty had been made, and that it had been ratified by the constitutional authorities of the Government; and that so far as his State was concerned, he should very reluctantly do any thing to change it. As to what it would be proper for this Government to do to carry this treaty into effect with as little trouble as possible, why, if more money was required, he would cheerfully give it; but as to letting the Indians remain where they were, it was out of the question; and if it was the last vote he was to give, he could not vote for it. To let them remain would inevitably lead to bloodshed.

Mr. LUMPKIN stood on rather different grounds in relation to this subject from most persons. From time to time he had been conferred with in his official station by the Executive of the country. He had communed with the present and late President in relation to this affair. He had never entertained but one opinion, and that was to execute with fidelity the late treaty. Mr. L. said he was aware that many of the Indians were opposed to it, and he thought them honest in their views. The Executive was disposed to treat them with kindness and humanity; and he was persuaded that the most liberal feelings were indulged towards these unfortunate people. The Government wished something done to soothe them, and allay their excited feelings. Mr. L. would say to them firmly, but imperatively, "the treaty must be executed!"

It might be due to the Secretary of War, said Mr. L. to state that he [Mr. L.] had been consulted in relation to this matter, from which consultation, he presumed, this document might have resulted. He told the Secretary of War that he would be as ready as any man, and would go as far in acts of kindness and humanity to this unfortunate people. The communications he had made to the War Department, he presumed, would be found on file there, although they were addressed as a private letter. If any accommodation could be made by giving them some additional compensation, no one could be more willing than himself to effect such a measure; but it was necessary they should be removed, and that at once. Mr. L. alluded to the murder of the Surveyor General of his State, and shortly after, his ferryman; all which murders he attributed to the Indians, and said, as far as his State was concerned, there would be no compromise. Mr. L. contended that the countenance these Indians had received here had been the cause of much of this excitement. Evil had been, and more would still be, brought on the Cherokee people by Ross and his immediate associates. So far as it was sought to delay or check the fulfilment of the treaty, the document would have no more effect than the paper he held in his hand. The decree had gone forth, and they must go.

Mr. KING observed that it was not his design to enter into any discussion with regard to the merits of this paper. He studiously avoided it. His only object was to lay the paper down, to give him an opportunity of bestowing on it such an examination as would enable him to decide upon the best course to take with regard to it. He was content, therefore, that it should take the direction proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. He sincerely regretted that such a paper had ever been transmitted to them. The State of Alabama was deeply interested in the question, as the most of these people being residents within her borders. Yet not one word had been said to her delegation on the subject. He felt confident that the object of the Secretary was a good one, but it was to correct those who could not be consulted; and if, said Mr. K. you were to adopt the paper to-morrow, these people (the Cherokees) would not be satisfied; they would still ask for more. He feared that this exciting subject had been taken up for political effect, and he would say that those who caused it ought to be aware that it may terminate in shedding the blood of hundreds and thousands. He was perfectly content that the document should take the direction proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and that the Committee on Indian Affairs should give it a thorough scrutiny. If they could suggest any thing to ameliorate the condition of these unfortunate people, and render the execution of the treaty more acceptable to them, he would cheerfully agree to it. But he must insist that peace shall be preserved; our people, said he, are among them, and their safety must not be jeopardized. He was prepared to give the Indians as much time as could be given without producing injurious consequences. How long a time would be necessary he could not say, but they must show a disposition to go, and commence their preparations for removal in good faith. In saying that he was disposed to give these people some little more time, it was under this single consideration, that they had been induced by those who were their agents here to believe that they could make some arrangement, by which they would be permitted to remain where they now are, and, consequently, that forcing them off immediately, without sufficient preparation, would occasion them some loss.

Mr. CUTHBERT confessed that he had been much surprised at the tenor of the communication just read, and one which he had not the slightest reason for anticipating. No information on the subject had been afforded him by the Department of War, or by any portion of the Executive branch of the Government. It surprised him greatly to find that there was any idea of changing a treaty solemnly ratified, on the very eve of its fulfilment; and he was the more surprised at the idea of consulting the States interested, when the very act itself of consulting them was to change the treaty. To-morrow was the day appointed for executing it, and yet it was proposed to consult the State of Georgia, six or seven hundred miles off, for the purpose of changing a treaty which was to go into effect to-morrow. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts he said, be cautious not to give too much consequence to this interposition of the Executive. Let him be cautious, as well from considerations of humanity towards those unfortunate wretches, as regard for the peace of the people of Georgia, not to give too much importance to this communication, for this treaty would assuredly be carried into effect, and any obstacles thrown in its way must produce the most fatal results. Would the interposition at this moment excite malignant feelings, a desire for revenge, and bitter hostility between the two races? If so, then let gentlemen reflect on the the dangerous consequences of such interposition. He should be glad if gentlemen would suffer this paper to rest for a few days. He was averse to any action on it, that would awaken hopes that never could be realized, and excite feelings which would end in scenes of mischief and bloodshed. Let me, he said, prevail on gentlemen to pursue such a course as will allay excitement, and avoid the giving of false hopes to those already too much deluded people.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he concurred in the view taken by the Senator from Georgia. He had oo many indications in another quarter lately in relation to quite another subject. We all knew how easily excitements were gotten up, and how difficult they were to allay. As the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs was not now in his seat, he would suggest that it be permitted to lie over informally, or on the table, for the present. It could then be called up at the will of any gentleman disposed to do so.

Mr. WEBSTER said he felt persuaded that those who knew him, knew that no personal or political reasons could have led him to the course he had pursued. There were no grounds on which to presume such motives. His sole object was merely to fulfil his duty to the country and to his own conscience. The Senator from Alabama seems to treat the subject as an excitement gotten up for political effect. For his own part, he had no such purpose, nor did any such feeling exist in the minds of those he represented. In moving to refer it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, he was anxious to see if something could not be done. It was his wish to treat these Indians with justice and kindness, and to convince the people of the United States that it was our determination to do so. Many excellent and worthy men had it in their consciences on their pillows, that some great wrong had been done to the Cherokees in the treaty of Echota. For this reason it was that he desired something to be done, which might disabuse them of this impression. If gentlemen desired to give them more time, he was satisfied. For his part, he was ready to give them more money, not so much on their own account, perhaps, but would do it to satisfy the people that we have done nothing that justice and humanity would not warrant.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that nothing could possibly be more unfortunate, considering the conduct of the people of Massachusetts to the aborigines within her borders, and the course of her representatives here, than his reference to their consciences. The gentleman said that the "consciences" of his constituents told them that wrong had been done to the Southern Indians. Where were the Indian tribes which once covered the territory of Massachusetts? Where slumbered the consciences of the people of Massachusetts when these tribes were exterminated by them? Yes, sir, butchered! Were their consciences to be aroused for the first time now, after the bones of the slaughtered red men in their borders had crumbled into dust, and when a case had occurred of which they knew nothing, and with which they could have nothing possibly to do? To satisfy their consciences? Who were these men whose consciences were so tender? Were they the men of tender consciences who would let loose all the horrors of abolition in the Southern States? Were they the men who, after endeavoring to excite a war of extermination between the black man and the white man, would now proceed to let loose the red man? We have, said Mr. C. the certain and unchangeable feeling that any attempt to arrest the execution of this treaty will be followed by scenes of violence and bloodshed, at the very contemplation of which the heart sickens; and yet these men talk about their consciences, and their desire to protect the weak and the ignorant, while they are seeking to produce them. God of Heaven! how are terms abused! Conscience! merciful God! for men to talk of conscience while their course leads to violence and bloodshed.

Mr. PRESTON said he had heard the message from the President, proposing new arrangements with the Cherokees, with unfeigned surprise and regret. He had hoped that this painful and complicated matter had been finally put at rest, by a determination on the part of the Government to go on with a slow, cautious, but steady pace, in the course prescribed to it by necessity. The Cherokee treaty was, in his judgment, wisely and humanely ratified. The same wisdom and humanity demand that, as far as the removal of the Indians is involved, it should be firmly carried into effect. Hesitancy and further agitation can produce nothing but ill. The rights of the States and of their citizens have been recognised and established, and should not again be disturbed. On this matter gentlemen from the States interested are entitled to lead. They know best what is best for them. I shall acquiesce in what they suggest. Nothing but my deference for them prevents me from at once moving to lay this message on the table, for the purpose of trying the sense of the Senate as to its further discussion. The execution of the treaty is intrusted to a gallant officer, not less distinguished by his moderation and discretion than by his bravery and military skill. Whatever humanity and prudence exact may be expected at his hands. The Indians must go; any interference here endangers them. As to money, lands, &c. give them as much as you choose, but do not further suspend the just claims of the States, or further irritate their already exasperated feelings. I hope the gentlemen interested will not permit the proposition for postponement to be drawn into discussion, but that they will put an end to it by a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that he omitted to notice, when last up, one important fact, which he would now call the attention of the Senate to. But for the ratification of this treaty, two years ago, the State of Georgia would herself have dispossessed these Indians of the territory on which they ought not to have remained. For two years Georgia had passively yielded and suspended the operation of her laws, under the full belief that this treaty would be faithfully carried into effect. But just at the critical moment, on the very day that it was to be executed, it was proposed to arrest it, and to consult the State of Georgia too, 700 miles off, after she had already waited two years. He would vote for laying this communication on the table, not to be taken up again.

Mr. WEBSTER stood on peculiar ground, it seemed, and he found it necessary to defend himself. Here was a communication from the President, deemed by him important to be communicated to the Senate. If there was any thing in that document which could have drawn forth such strange ejaculations, he thought they might as well have been directed against the source from which it emanated. He would not reply to the animadversions of the Senator, much less would he go back to his ancestors to trace the wrongs which have been done to the red man; they were sufficiently numerous, he dared say. The mere object he had in view when he moved to refer it, was that it should receive the respectful attention the importance of the subject demanded.

Mr. CALHOUN presumed that the object of the Executive, in making this communication to Congress, was to endeavor, if possible, to remove with their own consent that portion of the Cherokee nation who were yet unwilling to go. The object was a very important one, and one that was exceedingly desirable. He feared, however, the consequences to which the gentleman from Georgia alluded. The business of removing these Indians with their own consent, would be a very difficult one, but to remove them without it, would be much more so. He supposed that if any plan was effected by which further time was allowed, that the emigration should at least commence, and then it might progress at fast as circumstances permitted. Certain it was that no such arrangement could be made unless with the concurrence of the Senators of the States interested, but if it could be the arrangement, would save some hundred of thousands of dollars. But it was important, however, that the emigration should commence at once in good faith, and progress as fast as circumstances would allow, He was not prepared to say whether there was any practicable plan that could be devised to satisfy all parties, but he thought that a reference of the subject to the proper committee would be the easiest, was as ascertaining that fact. One of the members of this committee was a representative from one of the States concerned, and moreover the importance of the subject deserved a reference.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama thought it would be better to let the subject lay on the table for a day or two. As regarded the modification proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, it was totally unnecessary, as the Commanding General was fully authorized to effect the removal in a manner the most favorable to the Indians. He was not to force them off all at once, but gradually, and as fast as the nature of circumstances would permit, without subjecting them to injury and loss.

Mr. CUTHBERT said if there had been any fair attempt on the part of Mr. Ross to arrange the difficulties, he had no doubt they would long since have been arranged; but instead of that, this man had remained here creating prejudice, and excitement for his own selfish and ambitious purposes. If he had gone home to his people, while the fate of his nation was on the balance, and from thence have made his appeals, there might have been less reason to impugn his motives.

Mr. KING observed that no motion was necessary to lay the papers on the table. They could remain there without any further order, until it should be thought proper to call them up.

The documents were then, by general consent, laid on the table.

The bills from the House for the relief of Wharton Ward and of William A. Whitehead, were severally read twice and referred.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which the memorial on the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the relief of Richard Kidder Mead; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON moved to take up the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland Road, which motion was opposed by Messrs. ROANE and KING; and, after a debate, the motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the Senate took up the bill from the House to amend the act giving the assent of Congress to the act of the Legislature of Virginia incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company.

Mr. KING moved to amend the bill by a provision that the company shall carry the United States mail along the whole route, in consideration of the sum appropriated in the bill; which amendment was adopted, ayes 18, noes 13, after a short discussion.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the blank in the bill was filled with $300,000, being the sum appropriated—yeas 25, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Trotter, and Webster—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Grundy, Hubbard, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Swift, Tipton, Wright, and Young—18.

Mr. HUBBARD offered an amendment, providing that the appropriation shall come out of the fund of the Post Office Department instead of the Treasury.

After a debate, in which the amendment was supported by Messrs. HUBBARD, CALHOUN, NILES, and MORRIS, and opposed by Messrs. BAYARD, NORVELL, and KING, the question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. KING moved an additional amendment, making the sum subscribed for an advance to the company, in consideration of their carrying the mail, instead of a subscription to the capital stock: which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama offered an amendment requiring the company to give security for the performance of the conditions required of them: which amendment was also agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 21, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay of Kentuck, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, King, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange. Tallmadge, and Webster—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Swift, Tipton, Wright, and Young—17.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, May 23, 1838.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, on leave, presented a petition for a Revolutionary claim.

Mr. TALIAFERRO remarked upon the thinness of the House, and said before they proceeded to business, he wished to ascertain if a quorum was present. He would not make a motion on the subject, unless there was a mode of ascertaining how many of those gentlemen who voted yesterday to meet at 10 o'clock were present.

The CHAIR, on counting the House, ascertained there were only 87 members present, whereupon,

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a call of the House.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts asked for the yeas and nays, as the call of the roll would be sufficient, probably, to procure the attendance of a quorum; and, being ordered, they were, yeas 63, nays 66, so the call was refused.

Mr. McKENNAN, on leave, presented a memorial for a post route.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the case of Zachariah Phillips; which was laid on the table.

Mr. LYON, on leave, presented a petition on the subject of the currency; which was laid on the table.

Mr. HASTINGS, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the case of ——— Burnsides.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the resolution directing that committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of 1837, to pay for the horses lost by the Indiana and Illinois rangers, and moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. GRAHAM of Ia. solicited the gentleman to move its reference to the same Committee of the Whole having charge of the bill, to which Mr. W. assented, and the subject took that reference.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Robert H. White and others, which was agreed to.

Mr. CORWIN, from the same committee, moved that the memorial of Captain Hart, on the subject of steam navigation, and that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to whom a bill on the same subject had been referred, which was concurred in.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported Senate bill for the relief of Captain John Tilford, with a recommendation that it do not pass; and the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported Senate bill, with an amendment, to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas.

Mr. EVERETT, on leave, laid on the table an amendment to the rules, which proposes to provide that a member can be entitled to vote if he is within the bar at the calling of the last name on the roll; which lies over.

Mr. BELL presented several communications forwarded to that committee from the War Department, and they were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the memorial of the heirs of William Johnson; which was laid on the table.

Mr. HOFFMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas ap Catesby Jones.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Reuben Murray, of the State of Virginia.

DUELLING REPORT.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was then resumed, which was to print 10,000 extra copies of the journal and evidence of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes which led to the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. FAIRFIELD, to print a like number of copies of the reports.

Mr. MASON of Ohio was entitled to the floor, and was about to resume, when

Mr. OWENS asked him to give way for a motion to go into committee on the bill in relation to the explosion of steamboat boilers. He said the consideration of the bill would occupy but a few minutes, as there was no desire, he believed, on the part of any one, to protract it by debate.

Mr. MASON replied that he preferred going on then, and declined yielding. Mr. M. then proceeded with his remarks in review of the report of the majority of the committee, and to show that they had not assigned the true causes for the death of Mr. CILLEY; but, without concluding, he gave way to the orders of the day.

OREGON TERRITORY.

Mr. ELMORE, having waived his right to the floor, the message of the President of the United States, on the above subject, together with the instructions, as given in Tuesday's proceedings, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. McKAY asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House, with as little delay as practicable, the amount that will be required for the additional allowances proposed by him to be made to the Cherokees, in his letter to John Ross and others, under date of the 18th May, 1838, specifying under separate heads the amount necessary under each.

Mr. YELL objecting,

Mr. BELL moved a suspension of the rules; which was agreed to without a division, and the resolution being under consideration, would lie over one day, under the rule.

Mr. YELL objected to its present consideration, and thereupon

Mr. BELL again moved a suspension of that rule; which was agreed to, and the resolution adopted.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOWARD in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837."

The question was on the following amendment submitted on Monday last by Mr. BELL, by adding to the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That, if the President shall ascertain that all discontent and further opposition on th part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to th treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five can be allayed or avoided, by allowing an additional compensation for the lands ceded to the United States by said treaty, and that the Government may thereby be saved the expense of keeping on foot the large military force in the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

Mr. WISE, who was entitled to the floor, wen oa at length to review and condemn the Cherokee treaty, as a fraud perpetrated by Parson Schemerhorn and Agent Curry. The compact between the Federal Government and the State of Georgia, he insisted, was not binding upon the third party, the Cherokees. He was for compelling Georgia to abide the action of the Federal Government, and to castigate her if she refused to obey the laws of the General Government, for he would take sides with justice. He said this, too, as a State Rights man. A State was bound to obedience, and could be coerced to it on refusal. In the course of his remarks, having made some reference to the treaty with the New York Indians,

Mr. FILMORE followed for a short time in its defence.

Mr. WISE reiterated his allegation, that this treaty had been brought about by improper means, by the use of whiskey, and the withholding of the Seneca annuity. It was a minority treaty.

Mr. FILMORE replied that he had made special inquiry in reference to whiskey, but found the charge unfounded; that the treaty was made by a majority of the chiefs, and the annuity was withheld only for want of specie, as he understood; and it was denied by those who knew, that the annuity was kept back to coerce the Indians into a treaty.

Mr. WISE rejoined to the latter, and read, in support of the charge, a letter to Maj. Garland, from Mr. Striker, advising the holding back of the payment, and another to the same effect from Schermerhorn, who took upon himself to attend as the evil genius of the Indians every where.

Mr. TOWNS then proceeded to reply to Mr. WISE; in the course of which he expressed his regret that such a document as the message of the President should have been sent in; and though he gave the President credit for good intentions, Mr. T. could not thank him for it. If the knowledge of it should reach the Indians, bloodshed must inevitably ensue. Had such a paper have been issued twelve months ago, with the consent of the States interested, it might, perhaps, have effected its object; but it was too late now. The gentleman from Virginia talked of castigating Georgia. Castigating for what? Not for disobeying the laws of the land, for Mr. T. insisted that Georgia was on the side of the laws, and in adhering to the compact and the treaty made in pursuance thereof, was maintaining the laws. So far from having nullified, the course of Georgia had avoided any such issue. He deprecated, with much severity, the use of such a term as that of "castigation" of a State.

Mr. WISE explained that he had made use of the remark, in reply to what was regarded as a threat, from more than one member from Georgia, who declared that, unless this treaty was carried into effect, Georgia would take her own rights in her own hands, and it was in reply to that threat, that he had used the term he had.

Mr. TOWNS continued, and re-asserted his former point, adding that the House of Representatives, not being the treaty-making power, could not go into an examination of this treaty, with a view to its revocation. Mr. T. however, maintained that it was a valid treaty, and went on to defend the course of Georgia in extending her criminal jurisdiction over the Indian territory within her limits, a solemn duty imperatively imposed upon her from the pretensions of independent Government, and conflicting laws, set up by and enacted by the Cherokees. Hence this policy of her's was not of her own seeking, but grew out of a combination of circumstances over which she had no control. Mr. T. then went into an examination of the treaty, and maintained that, in every respect, it was conformable to all other Indian treaties. The whole difficulty, and the only difficulty, had grown out of John Ross, who produced it for his own personal benefit; for he had shown himself, by his own admissions in his letters to the Secretary of War, to be purchasable at a price. Mr. T. admitted that the treaty was made by less than a majority, but Ross represented a much less number than those who made it, for he and his friends were invested with power by only about eleven hundred, out of a number alleged to consist of seventeen thousand. So far from Ross being actuated by a regard for the interests of his people, or a love of his country, he was impelled solely by a love of lucre; and if enough was given to him, if he was bribed high enough, he would consent to any treaty, or any modification of the present one. After dwelling upon the subject generally for some time, he coneluded, and

Mr. MARVIN took the floor, and went on to review and condemn the recent policy of the Government towards the aborigines. He then commented upon the treaty with the Senecas, and said that the community which he represented would have their feelings outraged by any course of fraud or injustice; and he felt bound to protest against the course of the Government, in the payment of the annuity to the Senecas.

Mr. HAYNES objected, as a point of order, that the payment of annuities to the Senecas had nothing to do with the suppression of Indian hostilities.

Mr. MARVIN claimed the right, in committee, to go into the policy of the Government towards the Indians generally.

Mr. HAYNES said, if the gentleman wished to go into questions of general policy, he would withdraw his question of order.

Mr. MARVIN then went on to state that the annuity of six thousand dollars had not been paid, and that the Indians had been compelled to subsist upon charity. He had called upon the department, in relation to the subject, and had been answered that the money was sent in June last, but had not been paid, in consequence of the pendency of negotiations for a new treaty; and he referred, with objections, to the attempt to pay the annuities with goods, purchased in New York, which were not wanted, instead of paying in specie, according to the treaty. He said that it had been alleged, that the withholding the annuity would be used among the Indians as an argument that it was intended to force them into a treaty; and he believed that many of the difficulties with the Indian nations arose from the fact, that interested men, without humanity and good principles, had been employed in the making of treaties. He spoke of Mr. Schermerhorn, as one who had gained the confidence of General Jackson, but had conducted falsely towards the Indians, to this country, and to his God; and he would render his thanks to President Van Buren for the good sense by which he had refused to employ Mr. Schermerhorn in making a treaty with the Senecas; and he went into the details of the attempts of Schermerhorn to ge the confidence of the New York Indians. He ret peated, that if there was any thing fraudulent in the treaty, the people of Western New York would be in favor of setting it aside; but if it was in accordance with the views of the people of the nation, and if they were willing to sell their lands and go West, upon terms that were equitable and just, they would cheerfully assent to the treaty,

Mr. CUSHING briefly stated the history of the stipulations heretofore made by the State of Massachusetts with the State of New York in the cession of the lands occupied by the Seneca Indians to New York, and said that Massachusetts had stipulated that, in the occupancy of the territory, the Indians should be treated with justice; and that Massachusetts had no pecuniary interest in the treaty recently made, and was represented only to secure just and equitable terms for the Indians, according to previous stipulations with New York.

Mr. WISE offered an amendment, which he said he should move in the House, as follows:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein made shall be applied to removal of the Cherokee Indians west of the Mississippi, or to preparations for hostilities with them, until the Secretary of War shall have prosecuted to a conclusion of success, or failure, the negotiations to modify the late treaty with that tribe, according to the recommendations contained in the President's message sent to Congress on the 22d instant.

Mr. W. then went on to comment with severity upon the treaty made by Mr. Schermerhorn with the Cherokees, and contended that the treaty was made with a small portion of the Cherokees not properly authorized, and read from documents to support his views, contending that the treaty of New Echota was made with less than seventy of the nation consisting of over eighteen thousand souls, and that the people did not feel bound to attend the council, because it was summoned by Mr. Schermerhorn, who was not a chief of the nation; and that nineteen twentieths of the nation would oppose the treaty which was obtained, as the documents would show, by false representations and pretences. The fact that the treaty was made by less than a hundred, was admitted.

Mr. DAWSON and Mr. HAYNES both protested that they made no admissions, to be used for effect out of the House, either against Georgia or the Government.

Mr. WISE still urged that the pretended treaty was no treaty, and if the gentlemen from Georgia did not know any thing about it, they ought to know, and might, if they would look at the documents.

Mr. LEGARE asked if the treaty did not offer the Indians better lands, and, however it might have been made, if it did not in fact better the condition of the Indians.

Mr. WISE said he had permitted the question to be asked, though it did not touch the point under examination, which was, whether a treaty existed at all; but he would state that, if the land was good, the water was not, and they found it unwholesome, and were not so well off as they had been. He, however, recurred to the evidence in the case, and approved of the message of the President, which would cost the Government a hundred thousand dollars, though it ought not to cost them one dollar. He then went on and read from various papers to show the opinions of officers of the United States, that it would be unjust to enforce a treaty, made by a few unauthorized individuals, and opposed by the larger portion of the Cherokee nation. He read from a report of General Wool, a statement that the great portion of the nation refused to accept rations from the United States, for fear they might compromit themselves in relation to the treaty, and that they preferred to live upon the sap of trees and upon roots, rather than accept rations. The report of Mr. Mason, who had been sent to the nation, for the purpose of ascertaining facts, was also read in part, to support the ground that the voice of the nation was unanimously against the treaty, and that it would never be assented to as an authorized treaty, nor submitted to as such, until they saw the bayonets of the United States levelled at their breasts. It was extraordinary he remarked, that the authority of John Ross, according to the report of Mr. Mason, should be unquestioned by the nation, and that he should pursue the same direct course, notwithstanding many attempts to bribe him to acknowledge the treaty; and notwithstanding the abuse heaped upon John Ross, it was uniformly asserted by the agents of the Government that John Ross could not change his course, or change the feelings of the nation if he would, but that he stood unquestionably between the white men and bloodshed.

Several gentlemen interposed; and

Mr. TOWNS made an explanation in justification of the course of the State of Georgia, and admitting that a band of robbers had existed, not more disgraceful to the red than the white men; and upon this point he requested the reading of certain documents by the clerk, which were read. These documents consisted of the applications of Ross and his brother, Gunton, and others, to become reservees and permanent residents under the treaty of 1819.

Mr. WISE proceeded for a short time longer, when he yielded the floor to Mr. McKENNAN, on whose motion, the committee rose and reported.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

[The message is given in the Senate proceedings in another column.]

The message having been read, on motion of Mr. HOWARD, Mr. OWENS moved that it, with the accompanying documents, be postponed till Friday.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had no objection to the postponement, but he could not consent, when that day came, to set aside the public business for it.

Mr. EVANS should interpose no obstruction to the public business, but, on Friday, merely make a motion in reference to it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was glad the gentleman did not intend to discuss this subject at length in a preliminary stage, and Mr. C. should make no objection to the motion.

Mr. CUSHING protested against the principle of regarding the appropriation bills as the only matters of public business worth attention, as well as against any one gentleman consenting to let other business be taken up only at his own convenience.

Mr. CAMBRELENG disclaimed the idea alluded to by Mr. CUSHING; but he did not think the business promoted by a protracted discussion on the preliminary stage, when no facts or documents were before the House for its guidance.

The subject was then postponed without further remark.

On motion of Mr. WISE, the amendment offered by him, in committee, to the bill under consideration, was ordered to be printed; and then, on motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, May 23, 1838.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, his private secretary, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the Senate the copy of a letter addressed to me on the 28th ultimo, by the Governor of Maine, enclosing several resolves of the Legislature of that State, and claiming reimbursement for the General Government of certain moneys paid to Ebenezer S. Greely, John Baker, and others, in compensation for losses and sufferings experienced by them respectively, under circumstances more fully explained in his Excellency's letter.

In the absence of any authority on the part of the Executive to satisfy these claims, they are now submitted to Congress for consideration; and I deem it proper, at the same time, with reference to the observations contained in Governor Kent's note, above mentioned, to communicate to the Senate copies of other papers connected with the subject of the northeastern boundary of the United States, which, with the documents already made public, will show the acual state of the negotiations with Great Britain on the general question.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, May 19, 1838.

[The following important papers are among those accompanying the message:]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 27, 1838.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor, by the direction of the President, to communicate to Mr. Fox, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, the result of the application of the General Government to the State of Maine, on the subject of the Northeastern Boundary Line, and the resolution which the President has formed upon a careful consideration thereof. By the accompanying papers, received from the Executive of Maine, Mr. Fox will perceive that Maine declines to give a consent to the negotiation for a conventional boundary; is disinclined to the reference of the points in dispute to a new arbitration; but yet is firmly persuaded that the line described in the treaty of 1783 can be found and traced whenever the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall proceed to make the requisite investigations, with a predisposition to effect that very desirable object. Confidently relying, as the President does, upon the assurances frequently repeated by the British Government of the earnest desire to reach that result, if it is practicable, he has instructed the undersigned to announce to Mr. Fox the willingness of this Government to enter into an arrangement with Great Britain for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration upon the basis of the original American proposition, and the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government.

The Secretary of State is, therefore, authorized to invite Mr. Fox to a conference upon the subject at as early a day as his convenience will permit; and the undersigned will be immediately furnished with a requisite full power, by the President, to conclude a convention embracing that object, if her Majesty's Minister is duly empowered to proceed to the negotiation of it on the part of Great Britain.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Fox the expression of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

HENRY S. FOX, esq. &c. &c. &c.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official note of the 27th ultimo, in which you enclose to me a communication received by the Federal Government from the Executive of Maine, upon the subject of the Northeastern Boundary line; and in which you inform me that the President is willing to enter into an arrangement with her Majesty's Government for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition, and of the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government, as communicated to you in my note of the 10th of January last; and you invite me to a conference, for the purpose of negotiating a convention that shall embrace the above object, if I am duly empowered by my Government to proceed to such negotiation.

I have the honor to state to you, in reply, that my actual instructions were fulfilled by the delivery of the communication which I addressed to you on the 10th of January; and that I am not, at present, provided with full powers for negotiating the proposed convention. I will forthwith, however, transmit to her Majesty's Government the note which I have had the honor to receive from you; in order that such fresh instructions may be furnished to me, or such other steps taken, as the present situation of the question may appear to her Majesty's Government to require. I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my high respect and consideration.

H. S. FOX.

The Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c.

The letter and accompanying documents having been read, were, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of John Fellay, praying to be allowed the bounty land due him for his services during the Revolutionary war: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. YOUNG presented two petitions from sundry citizens of Illinois against the Cherokee treaty; which were laid on the table, one of them having, at the request of Mr. Y. been read.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, rose, and said he supposed that orders had been issued from the Post Office and Treasury Departments to receive for Government dues the notes of specie-paying banks, or at least that they were actually received, and he wanted to ascertain precisely the facts of the case, whatever they might be. With this view, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General severally inform the Senate whether any orders have been given from their Departments to receive the notes of banks for revenue, and, if any, what were those orders; and if any instructions have been given, that they communicate to the Senate what were those instructions.

Mr. WRIGHT said he would correct the Senator in regard to one fact. He had understood him to say that orders had been given for the receipt of these notes; but it had not been so stated. The information given here was, that the notes were received. But Mr. W. had inquired lately at the Departments on the subject, and no orders to receive them had then been issued.

Mr. CLAY said it was not his intention to say any thing more than to intimate the fact that they were received. He meant to say nothing of the forms or technicalities of the subject; but he took it for granted, if these notes were received, it was done in accordance with some authority. But, whatever were the facts, he wished to know them, and by what authority.

The resolution was agreed to without dissent.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of John J. Bulow was taken up, and, after a short discussion, postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The bill giving the assent of Congress to the act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia to amend the act to incorporate the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and, after some remarks from Messrs. HUBBARD, ROANE, and MORRIS, passed.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House, making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and for other purposes.

Mr. TIPTON said the Senate would recollect that the sum appropriated by the House bill now before the Senate, was much less than that proposed by the bill reported by the Senate Committee on Roads and Canals early in the session. The road was being constructed by skilful and experienced engineers, who knew better than any others could what sum could be usefully applied to the construction of the road under their charge within the year. In framing the bill reported to the Senate, he had adopted the sum required by the engineers. The bill of the Senate was discussed some weeks ago, and was laid on the table, and a call made on the Engineer Department for an estimate of the sum required to comply with existing contracts, and to preserve the road from dilapidation. The reduced estimate had been received, and in the aggregate it differed but little from the sum in the House bill; and the Committee on Roads and Canals, therefore, seeing the embarrassment of the Treasury, and the delay that would be produced in the passage of the bill through the House, if amended, had instructed him to report the bill without amendment, and to recommend its passage. Mr. T. said he would not detain the Senate by a speech in favor of the bill. All understood its provisions, and he was prepared with estimates on each item, and would be ready to answer any question members might ask in relation to it. It was votes, not speeches, he wanted on this question.

Mr. BENTON, after a few observations in favor of the bill, moved to amend it by a proviso that the appropriations made should be subject to all the conditions, restrictions, and limitations, as are contained in the act for the continuation of the Cumberland road of the 3d of March, 1837.

Mr. NORVELL observed that it was apparent to every member of the Senate acquainted with the subject, that this amendment was very artfully drawn, and that it contemplated the reimbursement of the expenditures out of the two per cent. fund, which was one of the conditions and restrictions in the act of March, 1837, which were to be continued by this act. He thought that this was a body which ought not annually to announce to the world that which was a fraud, and wholly untrue, for it was notorious that this two per cent. fund had long ago been exhausted, and that there was not the remotest possibility of any reimbursement out of it. He would add nothing more than to ask for the yeas and nays on this bill.

Mr. BENTON observed that the addition of the clause for reimbursement was of high authority, though it had not always been inserted in the bill. He had voted for this bill both with it, and without it. He had no difficulty on the subject at all. Bills for this road had been signed by Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, before any such clause was put in it. Still he was for retaining the clause. The gentleman from Michigan thought there was no chance for reimbursement, but that was a question for time to decide.

Mr. NORVELL, in order to bring the matter to a direct test, moved to amend the amendment, so as to exclude the clause for reimbursement.

Mr. MORRIS doubted the power to make an unconditional appropriation. He should have liked very much to have heard the arguments of any Senator asserting that power. Much as he felt interested in the Cumberland road, he would sacrifice it rather than not preserve the Constitution in its purity; and the people he represented would also sacrifice every thing to the preservation of the spirit of the Constitution. The Constitution appeared a dead letter, a nose of wax moulded at pleasure to suit particular interests. He found it suited all appropriations made on the seaboard, but would never reconcile itself to the western border. Did the Alleghany divide the Constitution? Was it to be made applicable on this side and inapplicable on that? He could not understand. If the Senator persisted he would defeat the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana expressed his regrets that the Senator from Missouri had offered this amendment. He knew the warm feelings of the Senator in favor of this road, but he hoped he would be excused by him for voting against this and every other amendment, as it was doubtful whether the bill would pass at all during this session, if it had to undergo another ordeal in the other House, where it had been passed by a very close vote.

Mr. BENTON, in corroboration of his statement that acts for the Cumberland road had frequently passed without the clause for reimbursement, read the titles of five or six acts passed during the Administrations of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe, which did not contain it. He had not time, he said, to examine all the acts, but he expected there would be found as many without the clause as with it.

Mr. NORVELL said, if the Senator from Missouri would withdraw his amendment, he (Mr. N.) would withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and the bill could then be permitted to pass as it came from the other House.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped the amendment to the amendment would not prevail. If the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was adopted, he should vote for the bill; if not, he would feel himself constrained to vote against it.

Mr. NORVELL hoped his amendment would prevail. Why, at this late day, were we endeavoring to sent an example pernicious in itself, and bearing a fraud upon its very face. Every body knew that the two per cent. fund was long since exhausted

Mr. MERRICK contended that the clause should remain. The Government ceded this road to the States, and if there was no special contract, there certainly was an understanding that the General Government should first put it in full and complete repair. Mr. M. said he was a member of the Legislature of Maryland at the time, and well recollected that was the universal understanding; so much so said Mr. M. that good faith ought to induce us to fulfil the pledge.

The question was then taken on Mr. NORVELL'S amendment, and it was lost—yeas 12, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, King, Knight, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Prentiss, and Preston—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Roane, Robbinr, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON'S amendment, and it was carried—yeas 27, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton Trotter, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, King, Knight, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Webster—15.

Mr. NILES objected to a clause in the bill appropriating $9,000 for the building of a bridge on a part of the road leading through Pennsylvania. Mr. N. thought the road was ceded long since to the States, whose duty it should be to keep it in repair. If they had the power to do that, why they had it to make a road any where.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] had asked for information on this subject, he would have found that his observations would not apply in this case. He was himself one of those most anxious to have this road ceded to the States through which it passed, in order to relieve Congress from any further trouble respecting it. The act was passed for this cession, and the State of Pennsylvania, by an act passed April, 1825, agreed to receive it. At that time there was an appropriation in the bill for this very bridge. When the commissioners appointed under the act of the State of Pennsylvania accepted this road, there was a distinct understanding by both parties that it was to be completed; and the question, therefore, now was, not whether this Government should make the road, but whether it should comply with a solemn contract.

To show the nature of the understanding existing, and the necessity for completing the bridge, he would hand to the Secretary, and request him to read for the information of the Senate a letter from General Thomas T. McKennan to General Gratiot, and explaining all the facts relating to the subject; and he thought that the information there given would be sufficient to remove all the objections of the Senator from Connecticut.

The letter having been read,

Mr. NILES made some further observations in support of his amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would state the case again. The stipulation on the part of the General Government was that this road should be put in complete repair, and ceded to the States. An estimate was made for putting it in repair, and in this estimate was included the sum necessary for the bridge over Dunlap's creek. The contract was made to build this bridge, and that contract was partially complied with. But it appeared that the estimate had not held out, because civil engineers were employed instead of military engineers. In addition to that, the commissioners of Pennsylvania were so scrupulous, that they expressly stipulated this bridge should be completed before they agreed to receive the road.

After some remarks from Messrs. NILES and BUCHANAN, the question was taken, and Mr. NILES's amendment was lost—ayes 11, noes not counted.

Mr. HUBBARD offered an amendment to reduce the appropriation for the road in Ohio from $150,000 to $100,000; and, after some remarks from Mr. TIPTON in opposition to the motion, and from Mr. HUBBARD in its support, the question was taken, and it was lost—yeas 17, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter and Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster, Wright, Young—23.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. NILES and PRESTON, after which the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading and carried—yeas 26, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster, Wright and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter and Williams.—17.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of Matthew Arbuckle.

Mr. SEVIER observed, that in consultation with several gentlemen of the Senate, he had been satisfied that this bill could not pass in the shape in which he had reported it, and in which he was so anxious that it should pass. He had, therefore, consented to modify it, so as to make the persons interested pay for their lands at the Government price, though he was fully persuaded that they ought, in justice, to get them for nothing. Mr. S. then offered the following amendment:

"That each and every owner of a Spanish or French grant in Arkansas, which was submitted for adjudication to the Superior Court of Arkansas Territory, and by that Court confirmed, are hereby authorized, within twelve months, to enter at the proper land office the land covered by said claim at the minimum price, under such regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall prescribe, whether such claim originated in fraud or not; and that upon the payment of the purchase money, a patent shall issue to each claimant for the land so held by him."

After some remarks from Messrs. BUCHANAN, PRESTON, and SEVIER,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to amend the amendment, by inserting the words, "being subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration."

This amendment having been accepted as a modification by Mr. SEVIER, the amendment offered by him was agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, May 24, 1838.

The SPEAKER having called the House to order, and but very few members being present, before the journal was read,

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana rose and remarked upon the thin attendance, and said he wished it to be seen how consistently those gentlemen had acted who were so zealous for meeting at 10 o'clock; and he therefore moved a call of the House, which was ordered; and after proceeding till the roll was once called through, Mr. G. said, as his sole object was to procure a quorum, he now moved that the call be dispensed with, but the House refused; and the absentees were called as far as the letter S, when

Mr. HOPKINS moved a dispensation of the call, which was agreed to—63 to 54.

The journal was then read; and as soon as it was—

Mr. HOFFMAN rose, and said he wished to submit a motion in relation to the printing of the President's message, respecting the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States, and called the attention of the House to an anonymous, slanderous, and libellous publication, contained therein, extracted from some newspaper, which was a libel upon the character of the city of New York, its mayor, and councils. This document had been printed by order of the House, and contained, by some accident or other, some anonymous letters from a New York paper, reflecting with great severity upon the mayor and authorities of New York. Mr. H. having drawn the attention of the House to the libellous character of the publication, and his hope that its insertion in a public document was not by the sanction of the President, asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee to which was referred "The President's message, together with reports from the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying papers, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 30th ultimo, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States," be discharged from the further consideration of the papers numbered 8, and 9, annexed to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the same be returned to the President.

Objection being made,

Mr. HOFFMAN asked the question.

Mr. BEATTY rose in his place, and said I object.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the reading of the papers.

Mr. HAMER called for the reading of the resolution to which the message was a response.

There being no objection, the whole of the document was read by the Clerk.

Mr. GRANT then called for the reading of a part of a Senate document on the subject, in answer to a call for every kind of information thereon.

Mr. BRONSON appealed to his colleague to postpone his motion till to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOFFMAN declined doing so.

The question on suspending the rules was decided in the negative—yeas 111, nays 75; not being two-thirds.

Mr. THOMPSON regarded this as a question of privilege, and worthy of consideration; but he could not bring himself to believe that the President was privy to the insertion of this scurrilous libel, taken from the filthy sewers of the party press, and he should therefore move that the SPEAKER do communicate to the President said paper, and know of him whether this document had been all sent from him.

The CHAIR said the gentleman could only attain his object by resolution.

Mr. KEIM asked leave to present a petition, but it was objected to.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John Jones, and others.

Mr. THOMPSON then sent the following resolution to the CHAIR, and said he should move it as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether document No. 9 and that which follows, accompanying his message of the 11th of May, were communicated to this House by his direction.

The resolution was rejected without a division.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to make temporary provision for the comfort and support of certain lunatics in the District of Columbia.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported Senate bill for the relief of G. and S. White, without amendment.

Also, Senate bill, without amendment, to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and other securities, of corporations created by acts of Congress which have expired.

Mr. POTTER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made a number of unfavorable reports, which were all severally concurred in by the House.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported a bill to authorize the Macon steamboat company to import duty free, the materials of two iron steamboats.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Duncomb Bradford, deceased.

Mr. POTTER from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Moses B. Coburn, and the administrator of Jacob Haines, severally praying for pensions: laid on the table.

Also, an unfavorable reprort on the petition of Elias Burnam and wife, for allowance in land, on account of Revolutionary services of A. Robinson: laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. POTTER, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, was discharged from further consideration of petition of James Reed for pension, and the same referred to the Committee on Revolutionary pensions.

Mr. LOOMIS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of A. L. Deleux: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will, on Saturday next, after 12 o'clock, proceed to the consideration of bills which have been, or shall then be, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions; which was concurred in—96 to 44.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, from the Committee on Accounts, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of uniting the two offices of Librarian to the House and Keeper of the Documents, and making the office elecuve by the House; and the same, on Mr. J's motion, was laid on the table.

The House bill, returned from the Senate amended, giving the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, and the amendment requiring commitment, was, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for 1837."

The question was on the amendment of Mr. BELL, and the amendment thereto by Mr. WISE, as given in yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. WISE resumed his remarks and went into a detailed history of the Golphin claim, and the connection of Mr. Secretary Forsyth therewith, and his interest in it; and contended that Mr. Forsyth had endeavored to get this treaty negotiated, and that, under threats from the Government of the United States, that, if the Cherokee nation did not assent to the treaty, they would be given up to the authorities of Georgia; and the treaty, he believed, was ratified by some Senators, with a view to prevent such a catastrophe. He then remarked that, as it had been intimated that there was a rod in pickle for him, or his argument, or both, he should close with a few comments, though more might be said, and further reading from the documents might be brought to sustain all that he had said or read.

He then went on to reply to some observations of Mr. TOWNS made on Wednesday, and in relation to the position the State of Georgia had occupied, and to confirm his assertion that the whole scheme was one of plunder and robbery; that such was the fact was admitted; and though the act was not justified, it was partially excused on the ground that it was not worse than other acts of plunder and robbery. He objected against the urgency of gentlemen from Georgia to have this treaty enforced, when it had been thus contracted by fraud and force, as they themselves admitted; and he contended, that though it was not directly stated in the President's Message, it was plainly admitted in that document that the treaty ought not to be enforced, and, in effect, that another treaty ought to be made. He would go as far as the President had gone in his message, and, as a friend to the Cherokees, he would advise them to accept the terms offered, believing it would be all they would ever get; and, as a friend to his country, he would advise the gentlemen from Georgia to acquiesce in that recommendation, and not to press the immediate enforcement of the treaty.

Mr. GLASCOCK then took the floor in defence of the action of the people and State of Georgia, and in reply to the general charges which had been, as he contended, unjustly made against them. He denied that frauds to the extent charged had been committed; and whatever frauds had been perpetrated were to be charged, not upon the State of Georgia, but upon the Government of the United States, and upon many of the political friends with whom the gentleman from Virginia had usually acted. He then went fully into details in support of the treaty, and to show that it ought to be executed.

Mr. DOWNING made some allusion to the Florida war, in illustration of the Indian character, and to show the necessity of being prepared to overawe the Indian nations, and to compel them to submit to treaties deliberately made. The treaty with the Cherokees, he contended, was not shown to be fraudulent, except in a proposed section, which had been rejected. If any other fraud existed, he was not aware of it. He had known the Indians long, and knew their character, and they also knew the character of the whites; and he alluded to the reception of news that a murder had been committed in Georgia, and to the succeeding message of the President, proposing the postponement of a removal for two years, with the inference that the Indians intended to operate upon the sympathies of our nation, to obtain more money. Should such a course be adopted now, he concluded that all other tribes would conduct in the same manner, entailing perpetual trouble and controversy. He said that the gentlemen who professed so much sympathy for the Indians must have gotten their knowledge of Indian character from Cooper's novels; but let them go and live among them, as he had done, and they would change their feelings. He had known a man, as honest as any in existence, in earth or heaven, go among them with every sympathy for the Indians, become, in one year, as thorough an Indian hater as he was.

He thought the treaty with the Cherokees ought to be enforced; and if the House had not paused—if they had positively refused to receive any appeal from the treaty, and had referred the Indians to the officers of the Government, the removal, he thought, would long before have been effected. He also considered the treaty favorable, and was willing to pledge himself for the people of Florida, that they would, to a man, consent to remove upon the same terms. They would give up their affection for their homes, if the Government would pay for their improvements, give them provisions for two years, and give them, at their ultimate place of location, a better country than that they should leave. He believed the white inhabitants of Georgia would agree to the same terms. He referred to the action of the Government in suspending the removal according to the treaty in terms of censure, and said he would appeal from Mr. Poinsett sick and weak, to Mr. Poinsett in the full vigor of health, with an intimation that the respect he had always had for the Secretary of War should not be diminished by his course upon this subject, though he thought it impolitic, and injurious to both parties to the treaty.

Mr. GRAHAM, after stating that he had no hostile feelings to the Cherokees, a part of which nation lived in his district in North Carolina, and with whom the people dwelt in amicable relations, went into an examination of documents and evidence to show the treaty had been fairly made, and in conformity with the views of John Ross at the time it was made, and that the Senate had not merely given a liberal, but a heaping high sum for their lands, which a chief of the nation had told him [Mr. G.] was more than the lands were worth. He read testimony to prove that John Ross had said he would assent to the treaty, and would recommend it to the nation, and inferred that John Ross was like an eagle shot by a feather from his own wing.

Mr. WISE interposed, and said that the documents proved that John Ross did go and recommend the treaty, and that it was expressly rejected at the council of Red Bank, in every form in which it could be proposed.

Mr. GRAHAM again read the testimony, and called for proof of the fact. He doubted that John Ross had ever recommended the treaty in good faith; but he would put the matter fairly, and was willing to hear evidence. He said it was positively proved that John Ross had agreed to the treaty before it was made; and, though it was made with Ridge's party, and was not signed by Ross, yet his assent bound him as effectually as if he had signed it. He also repudiated the idea that he would consent to bind himself or his constituents to compromise with people who came up repeatedly with the cry of money, money! He then went into a detail of the action of Congress in relation to the treaty for a short time, when he gave way for a motion from

Mr. STANLY, that the committee rise; which motion was carried, and the committee rose accordingly and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, an unfavorable report on the petition of ——— was taken up and recommitted.

The bill to repeal certain provisions of an act to amend an act imposing duties on imports, was read a third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate to settle the title to certain lands in the Territory of Arkansas, was read twice and referred.

The bill which passed the House, making appropriations for certain roads in Indiana, etc. came back from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. POPE moved that the amendment be concurred in by the House.

Several motions were made to adjourn, but were decided in the negative, without a division.

Mr. SAWYER moved to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee of Ways and Means; which motion was rejected—ayes 50, noes 80.

Mr. ELMORE moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MONTGOMERY demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 69, nays 81; so the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MALLORY moved an adjournment, which motion was carried in the negative without a count.

The House then concurred in the amendment of the Senate, and,

Upon motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, May 24, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania (which Mr. McK. said had been delayed in consequence of his absence) setting forth the sufferings and losses of the early settlers of the Wyoming valley, and instructing their Senators and requesting their representatives to procure, if possible, by their votes and influence, the passage of a law that will compensate the Wyoming sufferers of the Revolution for such losses: which was read, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McK. also presented the petition of Mary Ann Berry and Margaret Taylor of Philadelphia, praying remuneration for the Revolutionary services of their deceased father: referred to the Committee of Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. TIPTON presented a memorial from certain citizens of Cass county, Indiana, relating to a certain section of land procured from the Indians, and said to have been disposed of in an improper manner: referred.

Mr. T. from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported bills for the benefit of two railroad companies, (unheard,) which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading, and the accompanying reports were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were discharged from the farther consideration of the petition of William Walker.

BANK NOTES FOR REVENUE.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Treasury Department, in pursuance of a resolution recently offered by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, in regard to the receipt of bank notes for revenue. The communication was read, and was understood to state that no new orders had been given on the subject, and that the receipt of bank notes was a consequence of previous orders, and of the resumption of specie payments by certain banks. The communication was accompanied by a copy of a letter from the Department to public officers at New York, dated April 23, 1838, which was read, and which was understood to sanction the receipt of specie-paying bank notes from banks not issuing notes of less than $5, according to orders and instructions given previous to the suspension of specie payments.

Mr. CLAY moved that this communication be laid on the table and printed. He said he did not know whether this would furnish the occasion making it necessary for further inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to know whether further instructions had been given to any of the collectors. The fact had now appeared that they did receive at New York the notes of specie-paying banks; and Mr. C. was understood to say that he had a letter in his drawer informing him that, on resumption, the notes of specie-paying banks were to be received and disbursed in payment of the public dues.

The communication was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CHEROKEE INDIANS.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the President's message and the communication of the Secretary of War, on the subject of delaying, for two years, the removal of the Cherokee Indians, and of making further provision for their removal and for indemnities to be made to them, was taken up, and, after some remarks by Mr. WHITE and Mr. SEVIER, it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Secretary of War was required to inform the Senate whether any answer had been given by the Cherokee delegation to the propositions contained in his communication on the subject of the removal of the Cherokee Indians, and, if so, to transmit to the Senate a copy of such answer.

The following bills were severally read a third time, and passed:

The bill to authorize the entry of lands in Arkansas, covered by alleged, but unconfirmed, French and Spanish claims;

And the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio Indiana, and Illinois, which was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright, and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Trotter, and White—18.

This bill was sent to the House, and subsequently returned with an amendment, in which the Senate concurred.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Navy Appropriation bill having been taken up on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, he said a few words in relation to it, explaining some of the items of appropriation, and showing that a part of the expenditure was for the South Sea Exploring Expedition.

Mr. RIVES asked for information about the organization of the South Sea Expedition. He had understood that vessels had been changed, and men and armament reduced. Mr. R. wished to know upon what authority this was done.

Mr. WRIGHT answered, giving information derived from the Navy Commissioners. It was proposed to send the Vincennes with one hundred and twenty men, the Peacock with one hundred and five, the Relief with seventy, and the Porpoise with about fifty, making in all three hundred and fifty men. The Vincennes and Peacock were nearly ready for sea; the others would require some repairs or alteration. The amount of the present appropriation bill was very materially reduced when contrasted with that of prior years.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he would move to reduce it still further, by striking out so much of that appropriation as related to the exploring expedition. He had been willing to make appropriations for exploring unknown seas and for scientific purposes; but this expedition had been about to sail for four years, in which period it might have sailed round and round the world, and explored all the known and unknown seas. Every thing done in relation to it only served to expose ignorance and mal-management. As fast as one arrangement was made, it only developed some new error to be corrected. One vessel is prepared and superseded, and no man could tell why or wherefore. Instead of progressing, we had been constantly retrograding both as to officers and vessels. The frigate which, like another Argo, was to have made rich and valuable discoveries, and might have returned with the golden fleece, was superseded. No commodore, no post captain, or other officer of rank selected, but a young lieutenant, standing somewhere about the fortieth on the list; and now this expedition, of which so much had been said, and from which so much had been expected, had dwindled down comparatively to nothing, and was to be commanded by a young officer taken from a grade where there were at least fifty before him on the list. He did not mean to say a word to disparage that officer. He had heard him kindly spoken of, and his scientific attainments favorably reported on; but he would maintain that it was a disparagement to the service—a disparagement to older and meritorious officers. In short, naval men were disgusted, the nation was disgusted, with the whole proceeding. Were we, then, to go on appropriating money for this mismanaged matter, at a time when the Treasury was embarrassed and empty, and every dollar appropriated would have to be borrowed? He did not know how gentlemen could reconcile it, unless on the principle of loosing one arrow and shooting off another, with a view to find it; the time might come when we would be better able to do it. He called on gentlemen, and particularly those who had been preaching economy, to come forward on this occasion. He hoped the Senator from Connecticut would remember the sermon he preached the other day on the subject of abstract economy. The little while the Senator had been in public life, he had borne a distinguished rank in his party, and had the right to give us the admonition, as he had sounded all the depths and shoals of experience. Since his brief day, the Treasury had passed from countless millions to utter bankruptcy. Yes, sir, said Mr. C. he and his friends, after having spent upwards of one hundred millions of dollars, when about closing his political life, discover that notions of abstract economy are of no avail, and that nothing short of real economy could do any thing for the country. Here, then, was an opportunity for him to carry his views into effect.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke briefly in reply to Mr. CRITTENDEN. He had never been a very great friend of the measure from the first; but as a great deal of money had been expended without any practical benefit, he was unwilling to withhold the present appropriation. Mr. W. said, that up to the first of this month, seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars had been expended on this expedition; a part of which was expended in building and preparing vessels for sea. He said that the reason why no officer of rank had been appointed was, that no officer of high grade, capable of taking charge, was willing to assume that responsibility.

Mr. NILES made a brief and pertinent reply to such of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky as were levelled at him. If there had been a wasteful or prodigal expenditure, the gentleman ought to be satisfied that it was now reduced so far that they were carrying out the true principles of economy. Mr. N. could only say, if the measure was wrong, or ill-advised, it had its origin in the gentleman and his friends. It was one of their schemes for a splendid and magnificent Government, looking forward to new and untried worlds. It was never recommended by the Executive, but originated in Congress, and now, after so large an appropriation had been made, they were for abandoning the whole matter.

The gentleman says when I came into political life I found the Treasury full to overflowing, and that now it is bankrupt. Well, sir, there is some truth in all that; but how did it happen? It was brought about, in a great measure, by the gentleman's friends; and, I presume, by something of his agency also. The Senator from Ohio, not now a member of this body, pitched the tune, and, the gentleman and his friends sung to it with a vengeance. The revenue had accumulated to such an extent, and the Treasury was in such a flourishing state, the gentleman said we should be ruined if we did not do something to lessen it; the political doctors said the patient was in a plethora; if something was not done, the sufferer would die of the dropsy: there was a general consultation among them, and they recommended copious blood-letting. To be sure they did allow us five millions over the necessary wants of the Government; all the rest was let off. I was in much doubt at the time, though I voted for it. I thought they might be right for once, and, being willing to do all I could to relieve the patient, I went with them, though somewhat against my own judgment.

The next session, when the learned doctors assembled here, they said, "I told you so!" and "if we had not bled the patient so freely, he would have died!" Well, sir, what was the result? Why, the doctors found they had mistaken the case, and had bled the patient until the disease had assumed a typhoid character: he was in a very feeble and languid state. The patient, however, is now convalescing, said Mr. N; and if the same physicians would administer no more of their drugs, in a very little while we would be able to set him on his feet again. We have been brought to this, said Mr. N by the advice of the Opposition doctors; and I do not think they ought to try to throw upon us a larger share of the responsibility than we deserve. Mr. N. then made some playful allusion to the watchful manner in which he, together with his friend from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] had guarded the Treasury; and as they were to close their political lives near about the same time, he hoped the Senate might not be ruined for want of their aid.

Mr. RIVES had come to the conclusion to vote against this item of appropriation. He thought the expedition, as it was arranged, would be productive of more harm than good. Nothing could be more fatal to chivalry than to send forward this expedition under the command of a Lieutenant, when so many officers of higher grade would have been glad to have undertaken it. He meant nothing to the dispraise of Lieutenant Wilkes; he was willing to accord him scientific knowledge and high professional capacity; but in his appointment the laws of discipline, of established grade, had been overlooked! Yes, sir, in this appointment the very fundamental principle on which the Navy was based was violated! Besides those officers high in rank, some forty or fifty Lieutenants, the seniors of Lieutenant Wilkes, had been disfranchised by the appointment of that officer. That might be considered a very small matter to some people, but to others it was of vast moment; and officers were particularly sensitive on that head. In a philosophical point of view it might be nothing, but where the feelings of officers were concerned it was every thing; and on a proper respect for that feeling, in a great measure, depended the glory, he might say the very existence, of the Navy.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance had told us that no officer of a higher grade could be found to undertake the command. That honorable chairman might have better sources of information than he, Mr. R. had; but such was certainly not the information he had received. He was informed by officers who had volunteered to undertake it; but whose offers were rejected in favor of Lieut. Wilkes; officers, he would undertake to say, second to none in the service for all those requisites that adorn the naval character. What led to the selection he had alluded to? Was it Mr. Wilkes's supposed scientific qualifications? If so, he presumed there were others on the list of his own grade, and senior to him in appointment, that were every way equal. Was scientific attainment every thing that was to be considered in the selection? He thought there was a large corps of scientific persons selected from the walks of civil life to fill that department. Where then the necessity of looking to that requisite alone in the selection? He would have thought, with that branch so well and ably filled, that the choice would have devolved, at least he would have looked for one of high rank, proverbial for moral energy, promptitude in the time of danger, &c. These were requisites, he thought, much more fitting the station. He had been informed that, in point of seamanship, Lieutenant Wilkes stood the lowest in his rank, and that, for the last fourteen years, he had seen but little of sea service. However skilled then he might be in astronomical and mathematical calculation, he was not suited to the energy of the occasion, nor should he have been selected to the station to the disfranchisement of his own class, thus throwing a stigma on the whole character of the Navy.

There were other reasons that would impel him to vote against this appropriation. The condition of the Treasury was so embarrassed, that on all sides we had lectures on the necessity of retrenchment and reform. It was but the other day a proposition to raise the salary of the Commissioner of the Land Office failed, as did the bill for the humane and laudable purpose of establishing a hospital in this District, and all on the score of the necessity of retrenchment; and should we now fit out this Expedition on a scale of magnificence? Was this a time, when the Treasury was empty, and application after application sent to us for relief? It was only the other day that we were called on for money; and he thought it would not be very long before (probably the close of the present session) we should be called on again. If it were so, he would take the occasion to observe, that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance himself would not be more ready or more willing in giving all that was necessary for the legitimate wants of the Government. It was true they might differ as to the means by which money was to be raised only; but in feeling and an action on that subject, he would yield to no man.

Mr. WRIGHT replied at length to the objections of the Senator from Virgina. The squadron was fitted out with a view to defend it merely from the wild islanders or pirates. Were they to ask before they make an appropriation, who was to command a certain ship. Such a thing certainly never entered into his [Mr. W's] head. That matter he thought was left, and very properly too, to the discretion of the other branch of the Government. It might constitue an objection in the mind of the Senator, but it certainly never would in his; because probably he was not so well acquainted with these matters as the honorable Senator. Mr. W. said the difficulty was in obtaining an officer of the proper grade who would take the command. He had no doubt, if they were allowed the entire control, plenty would be found. Mr. W. then went on in detail to show that the command had been offered first to one officer, and then to another, all of whom had either declined, or been relieved at their own request, which he thought at least proved no want of effort on the part of the proper authority to make a suitable selection. He had heard that officers had sought it, but it was after Mr. Wilkes had been selected, and of course, would not have been superseded.

Mr. RIVES still contended that the reduction of the amount of men and guns did not destroy the rate of the ship. One of these ships, the Vincennes or the Peacock, he could not recollect which, had been a flag ship in the Indian Ocean; and that, if this course were persisted in, it would strike a fatal blow on the character of the Navy, from which it would never recover.

Mr. PRESTON was of opinion that they, as legislators, ought not to decide in so delicate a matter. The choice was was properly centred in the Executive branch. If it were with the Senate, they all might select some special favorite, of whose qualifications for that specific duty they were entirely ignorant. Besides, he deemed it highly improper for them to attempt to mix up these duties with the business of Congress.

Mr. P. contended that the purpose was purely a scientific one, and as such did not come within the prescribed rules that governed the navy. Suppose Lieutenant Wilkes had been selected by the Secretary to carry despatches to France or England, what lieutenant would dare come forward, and say, "My commission is older than Lieut. Wilkes's; I rank above him, and I must go on this very agreeable and delightful trip?" What would be thought of that; and was it not a parallel case? The gentleman from Virginia has told us that this was "a violation of all rule, of all law!" Wherein? I would ask. If in this country, let him show it; if in any other, let him advert to it. If the gentleman goes to England, the precedents are all against him; for I understand that Government has, in almost all instances, appointed junior officers. If rank was to have been consulted in this matter, all discretion on the part of the Executive would have been destroyed. It would have been cheated of its attribute, and you would have to take the first in command, and so go on down, for your commander. If the Department had considered it as a mere naval affair, a very different course would have been pursued. When Congress appropriates a million of dollars for any specific purpose connected with our naval concerns, obedience is to be enforced. If this were a strictly naval matter, would officers have been permitted to decline?

Mr. P. said he had heard much about young Lieutenants. He did not know what constituted youth in the opinion of gentlemen Mr. Wilkes was about his [Mr. P's] age, of years ripe enough certainly to be elected to the Senate, and he [Mr. P.] would be very glad to be considered a young man. Mr. Wilkes he knew was a gentleman of high nautical and scientific attainments, with enthusiasm, with energy, with spirit, with manly deportment, suited for this or any other occasion; and must have been in the Navy some five and twenty or thirty years, and could not be the very young Lieutenant that gentlemen were disposed to make him.

After a reply from Mr. CRITTENDEN, and a respond from Mr. PRESTON,

The Senate, at the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, with a view to obtain certain information in relation to the subject, then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, May 25, 1838.

The following Message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, Esq.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith submit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury explanatory of the manner in which extracts from certain newspapers relating to the introduction of foreign paupers into this country, and the steps taken to prevent it, became connected with his communication to me on that subject, accompanying my message of the 11th instant. Sensible that these extracts are of a character which would, if attention had been directed to them, have prevented their transmission to the House, I request permission to withdraw them.

May 24, 1838. M. VAN BUREN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, 24th May, 1838.

SIR: My attention has just been called to two extracts from one of the papers in New York city, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers, and submitted to the House of Representatives with your message of the 11th instant. This department has been engaged in collecting information on that subject during the last two years; and, while so employed, the local difficulties in some of the principal sea ports, caused by attempts to prevent the introduction of such paupers, became a topic of frequent communication to it—sometimes by written and printed statements, and sometimes in person by municipal officers.

Among other communications concerning it, some were made, in the course of the last summer, by a part of the Commissioners of Health of the city of New York, in a visit to the Department, and others were made by some person feeling an interest in the question, by forwarding the extracts before mentioned, as containing matter pertinent to the subject.

Without a critical examination, they were placed on file with the clerk having particular charge of that business; and when the papers in this Department concerning the introduction of foreign paupers, and "also what steps, if any, had been taken to prevent the introduction of such paupers into the United States," were collected for you, in the preparation of a reply to the call of the House, these extracts were submitted in connection with other matter bearing on those inquiries.

This was done in the pressure of business, without noticing the circumstance that in those extracts certain remarks and strictures of a personal character appear to be mingled, concerning the correctness of which the Department of course knows nothing, which it could not desire to aid in republishing, and which, had they been observed at the time, would not have been communicated. Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

The message and paper of the Secretary of the Treasury having been read,

Mr. RUSSELL said that as his colleague [Mr. HOFFMAN] was not present, Mr. R. would move the adoption of Mr. H's resolution offered yesterday, with certain modifications. He did so, he said, that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury might have an opportunity of placing themselves in a proper position.

Mr. CAMBRELENG saw no necessity for such a round about course, since all that was necessary was to comply with the President's request. He then made a motion to that effect.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio was clearly of opinion that that was the better course. The President had done all that could be expected of him—sent an explanation that must be satisfactory, and requested the withdrawal of the papers.

Mr. DROMGOOLE having made some suggestions,

The SPEAKER said the parliamentary form would be to move to discharge the committee to whom the papers had been referred therefrom, and that they be returned to the President.

Mr. CAMBRELENG modified his motion pursuant to the SPEAKER'S suggestion.

Mr. RUSSELL said it was with a similar object he had intended to make the motion indicated by him.

Mr. McKENNAN moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject till to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMS said, as the President and the Secretary of the Treasury had both stated that these objectionable papers had been sent to the House by inadvertence and unintentionally, he would not wish to hold either of those high officers responsible; but he would say, that if they had been sent intentionally it would have been the greatest breach of privilege he had ever known; and though he did not wish to apply any severity, it was apparent, that the papers having been sent, printed and sent forth to the world, as much injury would be done to the persons calumniated, to the mayor and highly respectable individuals of New York, as if they had been sent intentionally. View it as a question of privilege, he was opposed to any postponement, but as the gentleman from the city of New York was not in his seat, he would be willing it should be postponed till he came in.

Mr. McKENNAN said he would modify his motion so as to postpone the consideration of the message for two hours.

The SPEAKER suggested that the calling on committees for reports was in order, and this subject might be postponed till that business had been concluded.

Mr. McKENNAN acquiesced in that suggestion, and the subject, by general consent, was laid over.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Dr. James H. Spear.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which this subject had been referred, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Andrew Rembert, praying compensation for a horse lost in the service of the United States, and that the same be referred to the Third Auditor of the Treasury for settlement, under the act of January 18, 1838.

Mr. W. from the same committee, made on unfavorable report on the petition of Eli Darling, praying pension for injury sustained in the service of the United States: laid on the table.

Mr. W. made an unfavorable report on the petition of Alexander Grant. Also, on the petition of Rebecca McCann, praying indemnity for loss of horse: severally laid on the table.

Mr. STEWART, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of A. Avery, A. P. Pritchard, and P. U. Taylor, praying to be released from the payment of certain promissory notes: laid on the table.

Mr. HARPER, on leave, laid on the table an amendment he proposed, hereafter, to submit to some bill, but the title of it was not disclosed.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to extend the charter of the Bank of Alexandria, in the city of Alexandria, [to enable it to wind up its affairs,] which was postponed till Saturday, 4th of June, on motion of Mr. PETRIKIN.

Mr. B. also reported, without amendment, Senate bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

The bill having been read through, Mr. B. moved that it be put on its third reading, and made an earnest appeal in behalf of that motion

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to postpone the bill till Monday week, and gave his reasons therefor. He wanted the House to have time to look into the subject, and he was opposed to this mode of legislating by piecemeal.

Mr. BOULDIN remarked that all the charters of these banks would expire on the 4th of July next, and unless the House did not act upon this bill soon, it would be of no use.

Mr. THOMAS added further that there was no time now to go into a more full examination of the bank question generally. Moreover, the restrictions of this bill as to a resumption of specie payments, would enable the House hereafter to distinguish between the solvent banks and the rotten, if there were any of the latter. The bill was a somewhat hard one, but as the banks were willing to receive it he hoped it would be passed without delay. If they attempted to frame a measure for a recharter of these banks for twenty years, they might send a bill to the Senate, which would be rejected, and thus leave the District without banking facilities.

Mr. MERCER and Mr. JENIFER commented upon the very hard features of this bill, more so, the latter insisted, than any State in the Union had devised, and that he should move to strike out one of the restrictions in it.

Mr. PETRIKIN addressed the House for some time in opposition to the bill, and complained of the hurried manner in which it was attempted to be crammed down their throats, without deliberation or consideration.

Mr. BOULDIN said he would do what he believed he had never done before, demand the previous question; and having done so, the House reconsidered it—ayes 74, noes 60.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question: but they were refused, and the main question was decided to be put without a division.

The main question was on ordering the bill to a third reading; and thereupon—

Mr. YELL asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were, yeas 131, nays 41.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading today, and the question being on its passage, (the House having voted down a proposition to postpone it till Monday next.)

Mr. ADAMS moved to recommit the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with instructions so to amend the same as to provide that no dividends or profits should be paid to the stockholders of these banks at any time when they have suspended specie payments.

Mr. FILLMORE remarked that it required amendment in another particular. The bill contained no provision for the assent of the banks, and in case, therefore, of any suit being brought against either of them, under the restrictions of the bill, the plaintiff would be unable to prove the bank or banks had consented thereto.

Mr. BOULDIN had not the slightest objection to either of the amendments, but he dreaded hazarding the passage of the bill, which would be perilled if the bill was recommitted, and thereby further delayed.

The CHAIR now announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. BOULDIN hoped they would finish this bill, and he would move a suspension of the rule for the purpose.

Mr. ADAMS suggested to the gentleman not to press the motion, but suffer the bill to lie over for a single day.

Mr. BOULDIN persisted in his motion, but it was rejected, and the bill lies over for to-morrow.

The House then took up the President's message, as given above.

Mr. HOFFMAN reminded the House that, yesterday, he had expressed his belief that the President had no knowledge of these papers, and it gave him pleasure to find that the President had promptly and fully and completely exonerated himself. It had arisen from his too great confidence in the head of the Treasury Department; but Mr. H. insisted that that gentleman had not purged himself, for he had no right to have ordered such libels to be placed on the files among the archives of the country; and his stating that he had not given them a critical examination, was no excuse. He rejoiced, however, that the President had exonerated himself, and that he had himself proposed what Mr. H's resolution contemplated. He hoped they would be withdrawn, and that the act of withdrawal would read such a lesson as would prevent a similar recurrence here after.

Mr. DROMGOOLE suggested whether it would not be better first to lay the President's second message on the table.

The CHAIR replied that that could be done afterwards.

Mr. WHITTTESEY, of Ohio, inquired if the former document would go among the documents of the House.

The CHAIR said that ordinarily they would, but under this expression of the House they would not. The CHAIR would direct the document to be reprinted, omitting the papers referred to.

Mr. ATHERTON remarked that he regretted to hear the censures cast by the gentleman from New York upon the Secretary of the Treasury. He did not see why any imputation should rest upon the Secretary for trusting a clerk, more than upon the President for trusting the Secretary. The Secretary was distinguished for his untiring assiduity in the discharge of his duties; and he trusted that the gentleman from New York would take back what he had said of censure of the Secretary.

Mr. BRIGGS read from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and said that it contained no word of condemnation, or of disapproval upon the extracts, or upon the personal attacks contained in them.

Mr. CUSHMAN inquired of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RUSSELL] if he did not know, at the time he moved his resolution, that the papers complained of were on file in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. RUSSELL replied that his original call, moved by him, was upon the Secretary of State, who responded that the information could not be furnished by him unless by order of the President. Mr. R. then introduced another call upon the President for it, the substance of which he stated, and Mr. R. had no possible means of knowing any thing of these exceptionable papers.

Mr. CUSHMAN then went on to read the resolution, which called for all information in possession of the President upon the subject of the introduction of foreign papers, either from the correspondence of agents or other sources; and he commented upon the press of business imposed upon the heads of departments during a session of Congress, and it was impossible that the Secretary could attend to all his business personally, and was obliged to trust to clerks; for this reason, every indulgence ought to be extended to him.

Mr. HOFFMAN, after stating that the word if, was a very meaning word, admitted, that if the Secretary of the Treasury was distinguished for any thing, it was for his untiring industry; and then he went on to show the distinction between the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. These obnoxious papers, he said, were sent to the Treasury singly, and not in connection with a mass of papers; and he wished to know, whether such papers should be filed without reading and examination by the Secretary. It was well known that it was not customary for the President to examine the documents prescribed with reports of the heads of departments, though he might think it expedient to do so hereafter. He considered it the duty of the Secretary to examine such papers connected with the duties of his office; and had not applied any epithet not strictly in accordance with the subject of inquiry.

Mr. CALHOUN would inquire how it happened that, if the Secretary was a man of such untiring industry, that these papers had escaped his observation? And he wished to be informed by the committee to whom the message had been referred, whether the obnoxious papers had come in manuscript, and had been regularly copied by a clerk, or whether they were slips cut out from a newspaper?

Mr. RUSSELL produced the newspaper from which one of the offensive articles was taken, which was the New York Truth Teller. The other was a slip, apparently from the same paper. Neither of them was transcribed.

Mr. CALHOUN then expressed his regret that such a paper, in any manner, whether through negligence or otherwise, should have been communicated to the House. He thought it disgraceful to the Secretary that such a fact should exist, and should be published to the country; and he did not see how that officer could come out of the ordeal unscathed.

Mr. MENEFEE commented on the doctrine maintained by the last Administration, that the President was responsible for the acts of his Secretaries, and said that he must, upon that doctrine, be held responsible for this transaction. He was opposed to having the papers withdrawn from the records. He wished to have them stand. They would not go against the President, for it appeared that as soon as the President became aware of their character, he took the earliest opportunity to disapprove of them, and to ask leave to withdraw them. The Secretary he would neither excuse nor condemn at present, but he would desire that the record should stand complete, as, in one form or another, it furnished proper ground for examination, if not for censure.

Mr. SIBLEY stated that he was about to move an amendment, and expressed his willingness to allow the President to withdraw that part of his message which charged certain citizens of the State of New York with corruption; and was going on to comment upon the remark in the President's message, that the people of New York were under the influence of the banks in their late elections.

The SPEAKER stated that it was not in order to comment upon that subject.

Mr. SIBLEY said he wished to add to the amendment a clause giving to the President leave to withdraw that part of his message.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order to move such an amendment, as it was upon a totally different subject.

Mr. SIBLEY then went on to speak at some length upon the impropriety of receiving and filing such scandalous libels in the archives of the country, and sending them to the House to be placed upon the records of an American Congress. This was the first time such an offence had been committed, and he hoped succeeding Secretaries would be warned that it must not be repeated, and that their files must be purged.

Mr. CRARY moved the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. REED, who wished to make some suggestions as to the right of the Clerk to withdraw the papers from the files without the order of the House.

The SPEAKER said the Clerk would be under the direction of the House.

Mr. REED said he wished to avoid a greater evil, for if the papers must go upon the files at any rate, he wished to avoid the operation of expunging. He then renewed the motion for the previous question.

The motion for the previous question having been seconded, the main question was ordered to be then put, by a vote of 102 in the affirmative, noes not counted.

The main question being on the adoption of the resolution, was then carried without a division.

The original papers were thereupon ordered to be returned to the President.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to lay the last message on the table, and print it.

Mr. HARLAN called for a division of the question, and the motion to lay on the table having been agreed to—

Mr. HARLAN opposed the printing, and stated that the copy of the "Truth Teller," containing the objectionable article, had on its margin an endorsement in the hand-writing of the Secretary of the Treasury, directing the clerk to place it among the papers relating to the emigration of foreign paupers. Mr. H. after some further remarks, expressed his thanks to the gentleman from Michigan for moving the previous question.

Mr. CRARY said he had moved the previous question, for the purpose of arresting a most unprofitable, and what was apparent would be a very protracted discussion, and he returned his thanks to the gentleman from Kentucky, for having himself afforded Mr. C. with an additional and forcible reason, why that motion should have been made.

The motion to print was then agreed to, without a division.

Mr. BELL moved that the Committee on Indian Affairs have leave to sit during the sessions of the House; which was ordered.

Mr. HOFFMAN then submitted a motion directing the clerk to reprint the document without the two papers objected to, and that the complete document already printed be not bound with the filed documents of the House, but subsequently withdrew it.

The private orders being announced—

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that, on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, he should move the House to proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MONTGOMERY gave notice that, on the same day, he should move to take up, during the morning hour, the resolution of the Post Office committee, for the printing of certain maps for the use of the Government.

Mr. EVANS asked the House to take up the President's message on the northeast boundary, but it being objected to, Mr. E. gave notice of his intention to address the House thereupon hereafter.

Mr. TAYLOR, on leave, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to James Wyman.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petition of Joseph Row, the petition of E. Cheney, the petition of Shadrach O'Brien, for arrears of pension; the petition of William Curly, for pension on account of wounds received whilst in the service of the United States; the petition of Joseph Penley, for pension on account of wounds received in the service of the United States; the petition of Asa H. Morse, for arrears of pension; which several reports were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Arney, and the same referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The House then took up the "bill authorizing the issuing of patents to Augier Murch Perkins and John Howard Kyan;" the question being on the motion of Mr. MENEFEE to reconsider the vote of the House recommitting the bill to the Committee on Patents.

After a brief discussion, in which Messrs. MENEFEE, REED, TAYLOR, and CRAIG participated, this motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR then withdrew the motion to reconsider, originally made by him on the 19th instant, and the bill was passed.

The "bill to establish a pension agency at McMinville, Tennessee," was then taken up, on the motion made by Mr. MORGAN on the 19th inst. to reconsider the vote by which the bil was rejected.

The bill was earnestly advocated by Mr. TURNEY, and further debated by Messrs. BOND, TURNEY, and CRAIG; after which, the House refused to reconsider.

The bill for the relief of the representatives of John Jordan was postponed to Friday next.

The bill for the relief of Philip Turner, the enacting clause of which had been stricken out, was taken up with the motion to reconsider the vote of rejection made on a former day by Mr. UNDERWOOD.

The question of reconsideration was debated by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, TALIAFERRO, ALLEN of Vermont, and CUSHMAN.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question.

Mr. CUSHMAN demanded a call of the House, which was refused.

Mr. MILLER moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 80, nays 65, so the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Doctor Absalom Baird was taked up with the enacting clause stricken out in Committee of the Whole. The question being on concurrence with the committee—

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN, the consideration of the bill was postponed to Friday next.

The bill for the relief of Robert Wilmot, on motion of Mr. CRAIG, was postponed to Friday next.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of various petitions that had been referred to them.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the petition of Joseph Cochrane, reported a bill for his relief, which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the select committee to which had been referred the bill to authorize the occupation of the Columbia or Oregon Territory, reported the same with amendments. Mr. WEBSTER [Mr. CLAY assenting] offered the amendment before proposed to be offered by him, which is as follows:

Strike out the first clause of the resolution after the enacting clause, and insert,

That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the money or medium of payment, in which debts or dues, accruing to the United States, may be paid.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky addressed the Senate at length in support of the resolution.

4. The notes of banks which have a capital of less than $1,000,000, may be received, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, within the States wherein they are respectively located; but this discretion shall in no case authorize the receipt of the notes of any such bank which does not own and keep up in its vaults specie to the one-half of the amount of its notes in circulation.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time instruct the receiving and collecting officers of the Government what bank notes they shall receive, under the regulations aforesaid; and the said Secretary shall not direct the receipt of the notes of any bank until such bank has fully reported its condition, and shown its ability to meet the foregoing requirements; and if any bank refuses to give satisfactory information in regard to its condition, from time to time, as the Secretary may require, or if it shall appear, at any time, that the directors of any bank, whose notes are made receivable, permit the ratio between its specie and circulation above prescribed to be destroyed, without taking immediate and efficient measures to restore and keep it up, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the receipt of the notes of such bank in payment to the United States to be discontinued.

Mr. BELL, on leave, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the same Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having charge of that bill.

Mr. B. also reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the House any information in his Department showing the value of Cherokee improvements assessed under the treaty of 1835, and that he also state what amount of money has already been paid for said improvements; whether the improvements of that portion of the Cherokees, who have heretofore opposed the execution of said treaty, have been examined, and the value thereof assessed, and whether any, and what, portion of the value of said improvements has been paid, and in what manner; distinguishing the amount paid to the Cherokees who have emigrated, for improvements, with the amount deducted therefrom for their debts; and the amount paid on account of the spoliations of such Cherokees; and that he also state the estimated balance of the five millions stipulated to be paid by said treaty, which will remain to be provided according to its provisions.

Mr. BOULDIN made an ineffectual effort to call up the bill in relation to the District banks.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House again go into Committee on the Union on the "bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for 1837," but, it being objected to,

Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules, which prevailed, 108 to 40, and the House accordingly went into committee, Mr. HOWARD in the chair, on the above bill.

The question was on the following amendment submitted on Monday last by Mr. BELL, by adding to the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That, if the President shall ascertain that all discontent and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five can be allayed or avoided, by allowing an additional compensation for the lands ceded to the United States by the said treaty, and that the Government may thereby be saved the expense of keeping on foot the large military force in the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina concluded his remarks, contending for the correctness of the policy of removing the Indians beyond the Mississippi, and for the fulfilment of the treaty with all reasonable haste. He did not object to any necessary and reasonable postponement of the removal, but protested against the propriety of the interference recently made by the Executive.

Mr. HAYNES went fully and in detail into the history of the legislation of the State of Georgia and of the United States, with an account of the various treaties and stipulations made between the State and the United States, and between the United States and the Cherokees, together with the action of the Legislature of that State, down to the present time, and after proceeding for some time, gave way to Mr. UNDERWOOD, on whose motion the committee rose.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the survey of part of the Dismal Swamp canal; which, on motion of Mr. MERCER, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals; and, on motion of Mr. McKAY, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CROCKETT moved an additional section; which, after some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND, FILLMORE, and CUSHMAN, was agreed to, and the committee rose and reported the amendment, concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

Mr. MORRIS rose, and addressed the Senate until near four o'clock, when he withdrew his amendment, and offered a resolution repealing the joint resolution of 1816, and on this motion Mr. CLAY asked the yeas and nays, when there appeared for it 8, against it 36, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Morris Niles, Smith of Connecticut, and Strange—8.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, May 29, 1838.

The Hon. Mr. PARRIS, member elect from the State of Maine, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. BOON moved the House to take up the resolution submitted by him yesterday: proposing to fix the day of adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Objection being made—

Mr. B. moved a suspension of the rules, but the House refused.

Petitions were, on leave, presented by Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, and Mr. TILLINGHAST, of Rhode Island.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following resolution:

Considering the long delay which has unavoidably attended the action of Congress on many cases submitted to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, in the ordinary course of legislation—

Resolved, That the Chairman of that Committee be instructed to make the following proposition to the House for adoption, viz: That the House will at 12 o'clock, on Saturday, the 2d of June, go into Committee of the Whole House, on the bills reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BOND moved to include the bill to extend the pension system, which was agreed to.

Mr. REED moved also to include the cases of navy pensioners.

Mr. GRENNELL moved to amend this amendment, by adding certain other bills which he named.

Mr. CRAIG appealed to the gentleman not to load down the original proposition with so many propositions as would inevitably defeat the object thereof.

Mr. GRENNELL accordingly withdrew his proposition.

Mr. EVERETT moved some other bill, which was agreed to.

Mr. YELL moved to include the bill to extend the time of locating military bounty land warrants in Arkansas and Illinois.

Mr. CRAIG could see no affinity between this proposition and his, and he hoped the gentleman would not press it.

Mr. YELL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUSSELL proposed to include a report in the case of Stephen Freeman: lost.

Mr. REED's amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. PECK moved a reconsideration of the vote by which Mr. YELL's proposition was rejected; which was agreed to, and the amendment was then concurred in.

Mr. LOOMIS moved the following: "and all other private bills, each in their proper order:" lost.

The resolution was then agreed to—ayes 108, noes not counted.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Spotswood.

Mr. T. also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas P. Harrison.

Mr. SHEPPERD, from the same committee, reported without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Patrick M'Gibbony.

Mr. PATTON, from the same committee, reported Senate bill without amendment, for the relief of Moses Van Campen.

WYOMING CLAIMS.

Mr. PETRIKIN propounded an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and wished to know if that committee intended to report on the claims of the Wyoming sufferers during the present session. Mr. P added that it was a subject in which he felt a very deep interest, and few ever more merited the prompt consideration of Congress.

Mr. CRAIG replied that the subject was in charge of a gentleman from Kentucky, not then in his seat, who had not yet reported to the committee. His own opinion was understood to be that it would be reported on the present session.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of James Barrett, and moved its third reading; which motion, after some discussion, by Mr. H. and Messrs. POPE and WHITTLESEY of Ohio, was withdrawn, and the bill recommitted for the purpose of preparing a report setting forth the merits of this particular case.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Robert M. Roberts, or his legal asignee.

Mr. HOWARD, from the committee on Foreign Affairs, moved that the "bill to settle the accounts of Richard Harrison" be included in the order of Saturday next; which was agreed to.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. BOULDIN then moved to take up the "bill to extend the charters of the existing banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PETRIKIN wished his resolution calling for information to be first adopted.

The motion, however, was agreed to, and the bill taken up, being on its passage.

The question was on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions so to amend it as to prohibit the stockholders from receiving any dividends or profits pending the suspension, by those banks, of specie payments.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to add the following to the instructions: "and also that no member of Congress, clerk, or other officer, of either branch thereof, shall be appointed or elected president, director, or other officer of any of said banks."

Mr. THOMAS remarked that the bill had already been discussed at considerable length, and he believed the House was prepared to vote upon it. So believing, and in order to test its sense, he moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. MERCER, who renewed it, after making a few remarks, and after Mr. ADAMS had briefly supported his amendment.

The previous question was then seconded, 89 to 56; and on ordering the main question,

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the main question was ordered without a division.

Mr. MONTGOMERY then asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, being the passage of the bill, and, being ordered, they were—yeas 130, nays 46.

So the bill was passed.

NORTHEAST BOUNDARY.

The message of the President of the United States in relation to the claims of the State of Maine for aggressions, &c. committed on her boundary, was then taken up on its reference.

Mr. EVANS, who was entitled to the floor, went on to say, that the question was one of great interest and importance, and if the Government of the United States did not act in the matter so as to settle the boundary question, the Government of the State of Maine was bound by an act of their Legislature to take some decided steps. The message referred to claims of the State of Maine for the reimbursement of expenses incurred by them in relation to the boundary, but that he considered the least important question for consideration. He referred to the correspondence communicated, and commented upon the proposition for a convention upon the basis of the original American proposition, as modified by the British Government.

Maine, he said, was averse to the original proposition, which was made on the 20th of April, 1833; and there had been a controversy between the General and State Governments ever since, and they could never agree; but the original proposition has been coupled with a highly objectionable principle of surveying and exploration. It went to limit and restrict the commission, and, instead of allowing them to examine and run the line according to the treaty, they would be compelled to run a line different to that heretofore contended for. They would be allowed to depart from the true north line, and run a line westward, which would be in effect an abandonment of all the claims made on our part. The British Government would not agree to the proposition, except with preliminary arrangements, that the highlands should be sought south instead of north of the river contended for; and also, that certain rivers were not Atlantic rivers. Our Government refused to clog the commission with such limitations, and therefore the commission had not been instituted. Maine insisted that the commission should not be restricted by any thing but the terms of the treaty, because it was apparent that the restrictions proposed would all operate for the benefit of Great Britain.

The British Government proposed that the commission should ascertain a point in the highlands, which divide the waters, and it would inevitably give them the whole Territory in dispute, for the commissioners would certainly stop at the only point where they could agree, and that would undoubtedly be a point south of Mars Hill, where they had always been willing the line should run.

Mr. E. went into an examination of the terms of the treaty and referred to various acts of parliament and proclamations, together with the original charters of the provinces of Massachusetts, Quebec, and Nova Scotia, and contended that the original boundary of Massachusetts, (now Maine,) was upon the river St. Lawrence; and after the act of Parliament in 1784, which he contended, confirmed and recognised the boundary of Nova Scotia, and referred to the northwest angle of that province as the starting point to run the boundary of Maine, and from that time to this, the angle, as mentioned in the treaty had been fully recognised, and well known. But he objected to the terms of the commission, that they omitted altogether to take that starting point, and proposed to find another and a different one; and all the evidence contained in charters, treaties, acts of Parliament, and maps was to be left out of their consideration. He objected to this course, and insisted that it was now proper to consider and establish the tide upon the evidence known to exist.

Mr. E. concluded by moving to commit so much of the message as related to the expenses, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to lay the balance on the table; but withdrew the latter temporarily, and

Mr. FAIRFIELD proceeded to reply to his colleague, and referred to and read several papers to show that the proposition of the American Government would be favorable, and that it was agreed in the conditions that the award of the commission should be final and binding upon the parties; and he thought it would lead to a just and satisfactory award.

Mr. CUSHING went at some length into a protest against the terms proposed for the commission, and said that Great Britain had always declared that they would stop south of the boundary claimed, and would never consent to go farther north than Mars Hill. He considered that American proposition was an entire abandonment of the claims of this country, and he objected to them upon two considerations. The first was, that it was yielding to the false assumption that there were no such highlands as were described in the treaty, which were to be reached by a line running due north from the northeast angle of Nova Scotia. This false assumption had been made by Great Britain, and by consenting to the proposition, our Government would yield the point, because, by consenting to run a line in a different direction to other highlands, it would concede that no such highlands existed as were mentioned in the treaty. The assumption of Great Britain on this point was false, because such highlands did exist and were recognised, corresponding letter for letter with the description in the treaty.

The other objection he had, was that Great Britain had, in the negotiations of 1783, and in 1814, asserted that the United States held all their lands as a grantee, and could hold no territory to which they could not show a title by deed. This ground he was disposed to resist as fatal and false, involving questions of boundary wherever our frontier met with that of the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. CAMBRELENG alluded to the question being now merely preliminary, and that any final action must await a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and, after referring to the urgent state of public business in other respects, he moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. HOWARD, who promised to renew it.

Mr. HOWARD then went into a statement of the action of the Government in relation to this controversy; and gave assurances that the question was considered by the Government with great attention, as one affecting not merely the State of Maine, but the whole country. The subject was so considered by the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and it was known that this connected with other subjects, might involve the country in war. Under this aspect, though he, for one, did not fear a war with any foreign power, yet it became necessary to act with prudence. He would not sacrifice the least right, or just claim; and while he assured the gentleman from Maine that the action of the Government would be conducted with all due regard for our national rights and character, he thought there was no necessity for the haste sometimes manifested to enforce a speedy settlement of the question. He referred to, and read portians of, the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Fox, the British Minister, and contended that the terms of the proposition for the convention did not involve the evils spoken of by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. H. concluded by renewing, according to his promise, the motion for the previous question, but, it being obvious that no quorum was present,

Mr. THOMAS moved a call of the House, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered—ayes 18, noes 51, being over one-fifth, and a call having been determined upon, 83 to 43, was proceeded in only through the first letter of the alphabet, when, on motion of Mr. HAYNES, it was dispensed with—ayes 77, noes 45.

The previous question was then seconded by the House—65 to 57.

Some confusion, however, having arisen as to what would be the main question, the House again divided, and the result was ayes 63, noes 59, so that it was again seconded, and, on ordering the main question, the division of the House was ayes 70, noes 42, no quorum voting—

Mr. RIVES called for the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 89, nays 61

The main question being thus ordered—

Mr. EVANS then moved to lay the whole subject on the table, which was agreed to—ayes 88, noes not counted.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOWARD in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837.

The question was on the following amendment submitted on the 21st inst. by Mr. BELL, by adding to the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That if the President shall ascertain that all discontent and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five can be allayed or avoided, by allowing an additional compensation for the lands ceded to the United States by the said treaty, and that the Government may thereby be saved the expense of keeping on foot the large military force in the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

Mr. HAYNES resumed the course of his argument in justification of the State of Georgia respecting the Indian relations and in support of the treaty with the Cherokees; and after going at length into the details of the subject, he concluded his remarks.

Mr. HARLAN then obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise, which motion was lost—ayes 58, noes 67.

Mr. HARLAN, after proceeding some time in the discussion of the provisions of the bill, gave way to

Mr. POPE, who made an appeal to the committee, stating that the hour was late, and that many members of the committee had been constantly in the House since 10 o'clock; and, as his colleague was fatigued and had never before troubled the committee, he hoped the indulgence asked would be granted to him, and he moved that the committee rise.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 68.

Mr. HARLAN again took the floor, and continued his remarks, especially upon the subject of the Cherokee treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, after some time, Mr. HARLAN having yielded the floor for that purpose, moved that the committee rise.

The motion was decided in the negative—ayes 50, noes 76.

Mr. HARLAN was about to proceed, when

Mr. CHAMBERS said he was satisfied there was a mistake in the last count by the CHAIR, and renewed the motion to rise; he also asked for tellers.

The question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 71; no quorum.

The question was then again put by the CHAIR.

As the House was about dividing,

Mr. WISE raised a point of order, and inquired how many times the CHAIR had a right to put the question.

The CHAIR said the House was dividing, and it was too late to raise a question of order.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported ayes 23, noes 76—not a quorum.

The committee then rose and reported that they found themselves without a quorum.

Mr. WISE moved an adjournment.

Mr. CUSHMAN demanded the yeas and nays upon that motion, and being ordered they were—yeas 59, nays 83.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were about being called, when

Mr. WISE again moved an adjournment.

Mr. HAWKINS called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the roll was being called when our columns were closed.

Mr. DROMGOOLE raised the point of order that, it being ascertained a quorum was present, the House must instanter go into committee.

Mr. ADAMS insisted upon the right of his motion, as a privileged one.

The CHAIR stated that this was a new and important question. If the motion for a call of the House had been made before the motion for adjournment, there could have been no doubt. The committee rose, for want of a quorum, to report that fact to the House; and the rule empowered the House to send for absent members. The CHAIR thought it was a privileged question, which could be put at any time when fifteen members were present, with the SPEAKER; and, as no particular time was pointed out by the rule, it was always in order, when no member was speaking, or when the House was not dividing. He, therefore, decided that the motion for a call of the House was in order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE appealed from this decision of the chair.

The decision was briefly sustained by Messrs. REED and BOON, when it was affirmed by the vote of the House.

The question was then taken on a call of the House, and it was refused—yeas 47, nays 99.

Mr. HAYNES inquired if it was in order to move an adjournment.

The SPEAKER said it was not, and the House again went into committee at a quarter after six o'clock.

Mr. HAYNES then alluded to his motion to adjourn, and moved that the committee rise, saying he felt that he owed it as a personal obligation to those who yesterday favored him by adjourning.

The question was taken by tellers, and the committee refused to rise—ayes 46, noes 78.

Mr. HARLAN then continued his argument, but after some time, gave way to Mr. REED, who moved that the committee rise at ten minutes past seven o'clock.

Tellers were appointed, who reported on taking the question—ayes 46, noes 71, not a quorum.

The CHAIR was proceeding to count the members present.

Mr. MERCER raised a question, whether the vote was not the best test, and whether it was competent for the committee to do otherwise than to rise, and report the fact that there was no quorum.

The CHAIR said it was proper to count, and after calling upon members to come within the bar, counted and announced that there were 117 present, not a quorum.

The committee then rose and reported that fact.

The SPEAKER was about proceeding again to count the House; when

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved an adjournment.

Mr. TOUCEY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS said I hope those gentlemen who are in favor of adjourning will not vote.

Calls of "order" from the SPEAKER, and various parts of the House.

The CLERK proceeded to call the roll; and upon calling the name of Mr. ADAMS, he said I do not vote.

The call being concluded, the vote was, yeas 54, nays 83: So the House refused to adjourn; and, there being a quorum, it again went into committee.

Mr. HARLAN proceeded till ¼ before 8 o'clock, when he gave way to

Mr. CHAMBERS, who moved that the committee rise; but on taking the vote the division was ayes 33, nays 63, no quorum. The committee rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved that a count be taken, which was done, and the SPEAKER reported that 114 members only were present.

Mr. DROMGOOLE stated that there were members enough off the floor, but within the precincts of the hall to form a quorum if they were to attend.

Mr. WISE moved an adjournment.

Mr. DUNCAN asked for the yeas and nays, and being ordered they were yeas 57, nays 76.

So, at ten minutes past eight, the House again refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOLSEY then obtained the floor, and expressed a wish that the committee rise.

Mr. MERCER moved that the committee rise. He said the gentleman from Georgia wished to speak; it was then late, and he could not hazard his health and life in a silly effort to effect that, which might as well be done to-morrow.

The question was taken by tellers, and decided in the negative—ayes 46, nays 75, not a quorum; but the CHAIR voted in the negative, making 122, which was a quorum.

Mr. HOLSEY then proceeded to address the committee upon the merits of the bill, till twenty minutes past nine, when he yielded to Mr. McKAY, who moved that the committee rise.

The question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 52; so the committe refused to rise: but as there was no quorum, the committee rose and reported that fact to the House.

The SPEAKER being about to ascertain the number of members in the House,

Mr. BOON moved an adjournment, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 55, nays 70.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOLSEY again took the floor, and continued his speech, with one or two intermissions, when, shortly after 10 o'clock, he gave way without concluding.

The committee rose, and then, on motion,

The House adjourned.

Mr. CLAY, from the same committee, to which had been referred the memorial of the Portage canal company, reported a bill authorizing said company to enter a certain tract of land in Wisconsin Territory at the minimum price; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution of Mr. HUBBARD to change the hour of meeting of the Senate was taken up, and amended by Mr. HUBBARD; after which,

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, it was laid on the table.

The following bils were severally read the third time, and passed:

The bill for the relief of John P. Austin and Edward A. Taylor;

After a debate, in which Messrs. WEBSTER, STRANGE, CALHOUN, CLAY, BENTON, KING, and HUBBARD took part, it was passed—yeas 34, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Ala. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, and Young—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, Morris, Niles, Smith of Connecticut, and Strange—9.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, May 30, 1838.

As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. BOON rose and said that he was not disposed to embarrass the progress of the Indian appropriation bill; but believing that the morning hour, at least, could not be better spent, certainly for the interest of the country from which he came, than by considering the resolution of the Senate in relation to the money receivable for the dues of the Government, he therefore moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, then rose and said, that without interfering with the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, he rose to a privileged question. He said he had to announce to the House that the agreeable duty had been confided to him, and no doubt it was extremely agreeable to a large portion of the members of the House, that the people of Mississippi had re-affirmed the election made by themselves in November last, in sending SERGEANT S. PRENTISS and THOMAS J. WORD, as their representatives in the 25th Congress.

Messrs. PRENTISS and WORD then presented themselves for qualification, and just as the SPEAKER was about to administer the oath—

Mr. PRENTISS said, before taking the oath, he wished to state his objections. Though elected by the people of the State of Mississippi, in the election just taken place, he himself did not believe that election to be constitutional or valid. In taking that oath, sir, said he, I shall take it under the previous election, in November last, and not under the recent one, because, in our consciences, we do not believe the latter to be constitutional or valid.

The SPEAKER stated that it had been stated to the House, by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr GARLAND,] that the gentlemen from Mississippi had been elected, and were present, ready to be qualified as members of the House. He should administer the oath.

The oath was accordingly administered.

The question then recurring upon Mr. BOON'S motion,

Mr. PICKENS protested against this setting aside the public business of the country.

Mr. BOON asked for the yeas and nays on his motion, which were ordered.

Mr. SHIELDS called for the reading of the resolution, which was read as follows.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the money or medium of payment in which debts or dues accruing to the United States may be paid.

The rules were then suspended—yeas 112, nays 34, and the resolution having been twice read—

Mr. BOON then rose, and said that the situation in which he stood seemed to require of him some explanation, but however desirous he might be to make it, he did not feel disposed to bring up a discussion on this subject now, especially as another and better opportunity would soon be afforded on a matter kindred to it. He therefore demanded the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered without a division.

The main question was on the third reading of the resolution, and thereon

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, asked for the yeas and nays, which being ordered were yeas 151, nays 27.

So the resolution was ordered to a third reading.

[Mr. MARTIN, of Alabama, who was temporarily out of his seat when his name was called, asked leave, before the roll was through, to record his vote in the affirmative, but it was objected to.]

The resolution being then on its third reading,

Mr. DUNCAN rose, and said he had no objections to the adaption of the resolution, provided it could be so amended as to prevent consequences from growing out of it, which have heretofore done much towards producing the present state of "pecuniary embarrassments and ruin," about which we have heard so many and such loud lamentations; and also, what was more important, to prevent and cut off the sources of another rage for speculation in wild land, to the destruction of our free institutions—the prostration of equal rights, and the violation of every equitable principle of trust by which the public domain is held; for which purpose he would move the commitmitment of the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report the following amendment, viz: provided that no portion of the public domain, greater than three hundred and twenty acres shall be sold or conveyed to any one individual, nor shall any portion of the public domain be sold or disposed of to any individual or body corporate, except for the purpose of immediate occupation.

Mr. D. said he would not, at this time, attempt to detain the House a speech, in support of the principles contained in his proposed amendment—he would satisfy himself, by simply calling the yeas and nays on the reference, which he moved.

Mr. BOON said he would content himself with demanding the previous question.

Mr. LEGARE inquired if such instructions were in order?

The CHAIR admitted that he had some doubts of it, and was examining the paper to ascertain the point, when the gentleman from Indiana made his motion. He would not therefore decide the point at that stage, because, if the main question should be ordered, the instructions would be cut off.

The House seconded the demand for the previous question, and ordered the main question without a division.

The main question, being on the passage of the resolution, having thus been ordered thereon—

Mr. MARTIN called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered—were yeas 154, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Aycrigg, Banks, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Bond, Boon, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, Casey, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Dawson, Davee, Davies, DeGraff, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Filmore, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Hamer, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Howard, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Lincoln, Loomis, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Parmenter, Patterson, Peck, Pennybacker, Phelps, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Reily, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Slade, Snyder, Stanley, Stuart, Strange, Taliaferro, Taylor, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Underwood, Vanderveer, Webster, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, Yell, and Yorke—154.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Bouldin, Cambreleng, Clowney, Coles, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Harrison, Holt, Hubley, Keim, Leadbetter, Logan, McKay, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Moore, Parris, Petriken, Rives, Sheplor, Spencer, Thomas, Turney, and Jared W. Williams—29.

So the resolution was passed.

[Mr. LYON asked the leave of the House to record his vote in favor of the passage of the joint resolution from the Senate relating to the public revenue and dues to the Government.

Mr. L. said, when the vote was unexpectedly taken on the passage of the resolution this morning, he was necessarily absent from his seat in attending to the claims of two or three Revolutionary soldiers of his district, whose pay had been refused at the agency nearest their residence under a regulation which, in his judgment, imposed upon the pensioners and their representatives much unnecessary trouble. He alluded to the regulation which required, in the event of their failure to apply for their pay for a specified time, that they should be paid at the Treasury, and not at the agencies convenient to them. He said, in common with the great majority of his constituents, he felt much interest in the passage of the resolution prohibiting a discrimination in the kind of money to be received by the Government in payment for public lands and for duties. He was gratified that Congress had, by so decisive a vote, determined to put an end to a regulation of the late Executive, by which specie had been required in payment for public lands, while bank notes were authorized to be received in payment for duties. If he had been aware that the resolution would have been put upon its passage so soon after it came down from the Senate, his desire to serve even a Revolutionary soldier would not have prevented his being present and voting for it. He hoped the House would allow him now to have his vote recorded.

The vote could only be recorded by the unanimous consent to the House, and being objected to, the request was not complied with.]

Mr. SERGEANT, on leave, presented a petition from a wounded soldier for a pension.

Mr. CUSHMAN also presented the petition of Lawrence Brown and others, praying for a mail route from Kingston, Rockingham county, to Gilford, New Hampshire.

Mr. MONTGOMERY made an ineffectual attempt to call up the resolution to provide for the purchase of post office maps.

Mr. TURNEY and Mr. EWING presented amendments to certain bills.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOWARD in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837.

The question was on the following amendment submitted on the 21st inst. by Mr. BELL, by adding to the end of the bill the following:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars be appropriated, in full, for all the objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal West, Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided, further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appopriation unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the President shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the Government.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That, for satisfying all claims for arrearages of annuities, for supplying blankets and other articles of clothing for the Cherokees who are not able to supply themselves, and which may be necessary for their comfortable removal, and for medicines and medical assistance, and for such other purposes as the President shall deem proper to facilitate the removal of the Cherokees, one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HALSEY concluded his remarks with an expression of his desire, on behalf of Georgia, that the treaty should be enforced without delay. He did not object to the proposition to give them more money if the Government chose, but he objected to delay.

Mr. NAYLOR followed in some remarks tending to show that the Indians had been treated with injustice during the whole series of negotiations, for the purpose of forcing them from their lands. He contended that the lands belonged to the Indians by the gift of God, and they could not be forced from them by the force of negotiations or of arms, without disgraceful injustice. He eulogised the character of John Ross, and praised in high terms the firm, calm, and christian-like manner in which he had for a long time stood up amidst oppression, wrong and calumny, to defend the rights of his people. He contended that the treaty now relied upon for removal was the entire production of fraud, and was about to be executed in cruelty; and to prove the fraudulent character of the treaty, he went into an examination and reading of documents and papers, contending at length that the treaty ought not to be enforced. After proceeding some time, he gave way to

Mr. NOYES, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion being objected to—

Mr. NOYES stated his object. He said that a bill had been sent from the Senate to the House by mistake, which it was desirable should be returned without delay.

The committee then rose—ayes 36, noes not counted.

The message of the Senate upon the subject of the bill alluded to was then taken up, and the request to return the bill was ordered to be complied with by the Clerk.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House again went into committee, and Mr. NAYLOR continued to read and comment upon the papers connected with the history of the Cherokee treaty. He concluded with the expression of his fears that nothing could be done now for the Cherokees. He was in favor of the proposition to conciliate them, and to allow more time; but he never would vote for an appropriation to carry into effect a treaty which he considered so fraudulent and unjust.

Mr. CHAPMAN replied to the remarks of Mr. NAYLOR, and especially in relation to his commendation of John Ross, and his comments upon the history of the various treaties with the Cherokees, urging the propriety and necessity of executing the treaty, and fulfilling the obligations which the Government of the United States were under both to the State of Georgia and the Indians; and he spoke particularly in justification of the treatment Alabama had rendered to the Indians, and compared it with the conduct of some States where Indian tribes had formerly existed, but which are now extinct.

Mr. DAWSON followed at length upon the subject, in defence of the treaty, stating that he felt called upon to do so, because he was the only representative from Georgia who had belonged to what is called the Indian party in that State, and asserting that he was, and had always been, called friendly to the Indians. He went fully into a justification of the policy of the Government in removing the Indian tribes; and by reference to the extinction of the tribes in some of the Eastern States, argued that a removal was necessary for their preservation. He contended that it did not lie properly with the representatives of those States where the Indians had perished, to charge Georgia with cruelty and oppression.

Mr. D. having concluded his remarks he was followed by Mr. BELL, who spoke till 8 o'clock, when he gave way, without concluding, to Mr. WISE, on whose motion the committee rose, and then, on motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE

WEDNESDAY, May 30, 1838.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office, and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of Francis A. Harrison; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. R. from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Solomon Close; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, a message was sent to the House of Representatives, asking the return of the bill for the relief of Henry Beamish, which had been indefinitely postponed; and the same having been accordingly returned—

Mr. D. who voted with the majority, moved the reconsideration of the vote on the indefinite postponement; which motion was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of John J. Bulow was taken up.

This bill was strenuously opposed by Messrs. MORRIS, BUCHANAN, KING, and others, and warmly advocated by Messrs. HUBBARD, BAYARD, and PRESTON; when

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the bill was laid on the table—yeas 22, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, King, Lumpkin, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, Trotter, White, Wright, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Hubbard, Lyon, Prentiss, Preston, Southard Spence, Tallmadge, Wall, and Webster—13.

Mr. WEBSTER offered the following resolution, and asked its consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to take into consideration the act of June 23d, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," and to inquire whether, according to the provisions of that act, it is now competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to employ any bank which has heretofore been selected as a public depository, and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying those provisions of the said act which prohibit the receipt, in payment of debts and dues to the United States, of the bills of all banks issuing notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and to report their opinion thereon.

The resolution being objected to by Mr. MORRIS, lies over one day.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama,

The Senate took up the bill in regard to the town of Southport, Wisconsin Territory; and, after some remarks from Messrs. WRIGHT, CLAY of Alabama, HUBBARD, NILES, and YOUNG, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, May 31, 1838.

On motion of Mr. LOOMIS, the House took up and agreed to the following resolution offered by him on the 19th of March:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General furnish to this House an estimate showing, as near as can be ascertained—

1. What proportions of the mails of the United States consist of free parcels estimated by weight.

2. What proportion consists of free parcels estimated by amount of postage, and parcels that pay postage; and accounting all printed documents at pamphlet postage.

3. What would be the proportion of the amount of postage to be paid by the Government, in case all free parcels were charged to Government, at the same rate that private parcels are charged.

4. To how low a rate the tariff of postage would be reduced, and sustain the Department, in case all parcels conveyed by mail were chargeable with postage.

5. To how low a rate the tariff of postage can be reduced now or prospectively within two years, retaining the present franking privileges, and sustain the Department, with a rate of tariff deemed judicious and proper by him, in case such reduction should be ordered.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to authorize payment to be made to the Missouri volunteers, for horses lost or cast away in the passage to Tampa bay.

Mr. W. also reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Polly Estes, and that so much thereof as relates to the pay due to Aaron Estes by the United States, at the time of his decease, be referred to the Third Auditor for settlement.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans.

Mr. W. also reported the following resolution, which was discussed by Mr. W. Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, Mr. CUSHMAN, and Mr. FILLMORE.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to the House of Representatives, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a copy of each survey, and chart accompanying the same, that has been heretofore made, of the shores, harbors, inlets, and waters of Lake Erie; also, a copy of each similar survey that has been made of Lake Michigan.

Mr. BRONSON moved to include "Lake Ontario."

Mr. CRARY thought that if the Committee on Commerce had made themselves acquainted with the character of the lake surveys, they would not have proposed this resolution. All the surveys heretofore had been confined to the mouths of rivers and creeks, and were of no general service in the lake navigation. He had called the attention of the House to this subject early in the session, by offering a resolution for a survey of the upper part of Lake Erie, Detroit river, Lake St. Clair, Saginaw bay, Thunder bay islands, Straits of Mackinac, St. Mary river, and Green bay; and he hoped for some more definite action on the subject, than was proposed by the present resolution. These lakes had been surveyed by the British Government, so far as their shores were concerned. As long ago as 1826, Colonel Long found a company of British surveyors employed on the waters of Lake Superior. Our Government had yet done nothing. We were compelled at the mouth of Detroit river to make use of British waters, in passing White Wood Island, when it was probable that the American channel to the westward of the island was equally good for navigation, if it were only surveyed. For the want of a survey the commerce of the lakes was exposed to frequent disasters. Since the opening of navigation one vessel, with a valuable cargo, had been lost on a reef in the Straits of Mackinac, and this was but an item in the account of the losses to which the lake commerce was yearly subjected by the neglect of the Government. Few men here seemed to be aware of the extent, or of the importance of that commerce. He heped it would have its due share of attention hereafter. Sure he said that it richly deserved it.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the whole subject was then postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. DEGRAFF, from the same committee, reported against any action by Congress on the petition of Benjamin Ringold, and that it be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; which was agreed to

Mr. YELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported Senate bill, without amendment, to settle the titles to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the trustees of Oxford, O. to enter another section in lieu of section sixteen.

Mr. HASTINGS, from the committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac Lilley.

Mr. THOMAS moved that the bill for the relief of Cazot's heirs be included in the special order of Saturday; which was agreed.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, it was agreed that that special order should be commenced at half past 10 o'clock.

Mr. PARMENTER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas Rutledge, deceased.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the heirs and legatees of Everard Meade.

Mr. T. also reported a bill for the relief of Rebecca Burch, widow of Benjamin Burch, deceased.

Also, a bill for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. William Lewis.

Mr. RARIDEN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported against the petition of John Armstrong, which was laid on the table.

Mr. GRENNELL, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That all bills providing for pensions or payments to the widows of officers and soldiers, be added to the special order of assignment for Saturday next. Also, the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, in the case of Elijah Truman.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to include the case of a lunatic soldier, (Freeman,) who had been deprived of his pension on account of his inability, from being a lunatic, to receive his pension.

Mr. GRENNELL accepted this as a modification.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana said he should object to this resolution.

Mr. MORGAN moved to include the "bill authorizing the Secretary of War to allow compensation to pension agents:" lost.

The resolution was then rejected.

Mr. BRONSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill making an appropriation for completing the public buildings in Wisconsin.

Also, a bill to confirm the act of the Legislative Council of Florida, incorporating the Florida railroad company, and granting right of way thereto.

The bill to require the judges of the District Court of the United States of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in that State, was, on motion of Mr. CROCKETT, taken up on its third reading; and after being opposed by Messrs. BOND and FILLMORE, and sustained by Messrs. GARLAND of Virginia, CROCKETT, and SHIELDS, when the bill, by the application of the previous question, moved by Mr. CROCKETT, was passed.

Mr. BELL, on leave, presented the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts prescribing the mode of taking depositions, by authorizing all persons, authorized by the laws of the States to take depositions in causes pending in the State courts, to take depositions in causes pending in the Courts of the United States; and by enacting such other provisions as shall, in their opinion, promote the convenience of suitors, without removing any of the resrictions necessary to the safe administration of justice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, on leave, presented the following resolution, which was read, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Madisonville, in the parish of St. Tammany, to Warners, in the parish of Washington, State of Lousisiana.

On motion of Mr. LYON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of passing a law prohibiting, under suitable penalties, persons in command of vessels from discharging ballast into the channel or anchorage ground of any bay or harbor in the United States, so as to obstruct the navigation thereof.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOWARD in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837.

The question was on the following amendment submitted on the 21st inst. by Mr. BELL, by adding to the end of the bill the following:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars be appropriated, in full, for all the objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal West: Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided, further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appropriation, unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the President shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the Government.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That, for satisfying all claims for arrearages of annuities, for supplying blankets and other articles of clothing for the Cherokees who are not able to supply themselves, and which may be necessary for their comfortable removal, and for medicines and medical assistance, and for such other purposes as the President shall deem proper to facilitate the removal of the Cherokees, one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BELL continued his remarks, commenced yesterday, and referred again to the fact, that the contingency upon which it had been proposed to keep an army in the South of 8,000 men, no longer existed, at least in part. He would not go into a strict examination of the treaty with the Cherokees. He considered that the policy of removal had been long established, and he had thought that the treaty was favorable for the Cherokees. Whether it had been fairly or fraudulently made; whether it was true that John Ross was an honest patriot or a knave, was a matter that he did not intend to decide. He still thought it too late to recede from the policy of removal, as necessary for our people, and best for the Indians; and he thought it incompatible with the interest of the whites, that the Indians should found an independent Government within the limits of the States. No man, he said, would be more rejoiced than he, to know that the Cherokees were a prosperous, flourishing, and civilized people. He should rejoice in their prosperity; but he thought John Ross, whether honest or otherwise, mistaken in his policy. He considered the removal westward necessary and expedient for the Indians themselves, and had never blamed the Georgians for the course they had taken. The United States were bound to remove the Cherokees as soon as they could; and when the Indians proposed to set down permanently, with an independent form of Government, it was time for Georgia to speak, or never.

Mr. B. then went into an examination of details with respect to Indian treaties, objecting that too many had been made recently, and that too many officers and agents of different kinds had been employed by the Government, in consequence of the numerous treaties; and he objected to the power vested in the Executive to make Indian treaties, urging that it would have been better and safer to have regulated our Indian relations by laws of Congress. He then gave a review of the multiplied frauds that grew out of the operation of this system, and adverted to a number of documents sustaining the allegation that the source of them was to be traced to unfaithful agents, who were connected with the speculators. Mr. B. then went into a history of the treaties, and enlarged upon the circumstances connected with them at great length.

As soon as Mr. BELL had concluded, Mr. EVERETT took the floor, and, after addressing the House for some time, he was followed by Mr. CRARY and Mr. TURNEY. The latter gentleman was on the floor, when, some time after dark, he gave way, the committee rose, and,

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the Indian bill was made the special order at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, May 31, 1838.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition from N. Griswold, of Illinois, praying the establishment of a certain post route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of F. P. Blair, praying to be released from his liabilities as surety for a postmaster of Kentucky, for reasons therein set forth; also, praying relief in relation to a claim against the Post Office Department which was withheld by the present Postmaster: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he rose to present two petitions; and when he did so, he hoped he might not shock the nervous sensibility of gentlemen, when he told them that both prayed for the establishment of that monster, so frighful in the eyes of old maids, old bachelors, and old politicians. These petitions came from the merchants, the manufacturers, and hardy yeomanry of the country, without respect to party. Mr. C. said when he began to unfold one of them, he really conceived it was from all the people of the United States. But if not quite all, it certainly was from a great many of them. He was sorry that he could not dispose of them in no other way, just now, than move to lay them on the table.

Mr. President [said Mr. C.] we want a United States Bank; monstrous, and monster as it was, it afforded us the best currency that ever a nation was blest with. The whole West wants a Bank of the United States; but I speak now in relation to my own State, Kentucky, whose products are disposed of from North Carolina to the Balize, are valuable and various, the exchanges on which are ruinous, and Kentucky only describes the condition of most of the other States. We want a currency, Mr. President, of one uniform value; that, like the flag of the country, would be received every where, and be respected every where. It is not hard money I allude to, but something light and portable, such as we can put in our pockets at Boston, and travel with to Orleans, without loss or interruption. Such a currency can only be found by the establishment of a Bank of the United States. Could you adjourn us, Mr. President, and let us go home, I should with great pleasure accompany you to the Great Crossings on my way to Ashland. What has become of the resolution of the Senator from Alabama, about which he appeared so anxious some weeks since? The time fixed by him then has already arrived, and why does he still let it sleep? Here, we can do nothing: whereas, if we went home, we might realize something from the products of our own labor. I must take occasion, however, to congratulate the country on the repeal of that odious measure, the Specie Circular; that indeed was something done, for which the people will thanks us.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, when the Senator offered the petitions, he did not hear distinctly the source from whence they emanated. It struck his ear that the first was from a place in Alabama. Will the Senator from Kentucky say, from what place his first petition came?

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, (shaking his head,) Oh, no, sir; no such thing is to be looked for from that quarter, at present. If my namesake had been in his usual listening attitude, he would have distinctly heard the word Jamaica, in New York.

Mr. KING observed that there was no danger of petitions of this character coming from Alabama; but if they did, they would come from a different description of persons than those spoken of by the Senator from Kentucky. They would have come from speculators, and not from the industrious and productive classes of the country. He should have said nothing on this subject, if the Senator from Kentucky had not made an appeal to him in reference to the resolution for adjournment, and avowed his wish to go home in order that he might go to work and do something useful. Why he had always understood that the honorable Senator was laboring in his vocation here, and that he could better promote the great object he had in view by standing before the public eye, in his legislative capacity, than in the less conspicuous walks of private life. Why the resolution had not been called up was obvious to all. It was on its third reading, and would come up like all the regular business of the Senate. After consulting with some members of the other House better acquainted with the extent and importance of the business of that body than any member of this could be, he had come to the conclusion that it would be better to leave it to them to fix upon the day of adjournment. He had reason to believe that the 2d or 9th of July would be fixed upon, and more probably the 2d.

Mr. WEBSTER would suggest to the Senator from Alabama the propriety of calling up his resolution, and propose the adjournment for the 2d of July.

Mr. WRIGHT said it would appear then that one of these petitions was from a portion of his constituents; but whether they asked for a bank or the bank was not shown. The petitions were not read, and he wished the Senator had enlightened us on the subject.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama observed that the Senator from Kentucky was somewhat mistaken—that he did not designate the description of persons in Alabama who were in favor of a National Bank. His honorable colleague, however, did designate them correctly. When he asked the question he did of the Senator from Kentucky, he was under the impression that one of the petitions came from Alabama, and if such had been the fact, he would have felt himself called upon to give some explanations as to the tone of public sentiment in the State. One idea struck him very forcibly while the Senator from Kentucky was speaking, and that was, if any of them had been indulging in a Rip Van Winkle sleep for the last four years, and had waked up in the Senate this morning, under the sound of the Senator's voice, they would have thought that they were still in the panic session of four years ago, and that the Senator from Kentucky was treating them with one of those pathetic descriptions of ruin and distress, which were so frequent during that period. There was a remarkable resemblance between the speeches made during that same panic session, and those made by the Senator and his friends at this. Then the panic petitions followed the panic speeches, and were nothing but reverberations of the cry of ruin, distress, and bankruptcy which was first uttered on that floor. Now the case was the same. It had been announced again and again by the Senator and his friends, that nothing could save us from impending ruin but a National Bank, and behold the same thing was reverberated in a bank petition, even conforming to that Senator's plan so lately promulgated. He knew as well as his colleague did what class of persons it was in Alabama who were in favor of a National Bank. His colleague had justly remarked that it was not the great body of the people—not the planters—not the productive class; it was not that class known as Southern State rights men who were anxious for such an institution. But the National Bank men in Alabama were a very different description of persons, and formed but a very small part of its population.

Mr. BUCHANAN called for the reading of the petition from Connecticut.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said whether the petitions proposed to grant charters to any existing institutions, or to establish a new one, did not appear. While up, he would like the Senator from Alabama to define what he meant by "speculators." He thought it strange that the Senator, without any knowledge of the parties, or the feelings of the community from which these documents emanated, should undertake to denounce them in that wholesale manner. He, Mr. C. would venture to assert that if the Senator went home, and met his constituents in large bodies, at the Methodist or Baptist meeting houses, or would mix among them familiarly, take his chew of tobacco in his mouth, and tattle with his neighbors, he would find a much larger portion in favor of a bank than he was aware of.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he ought to know the feelings and wishes of the people of his own State. If there was any change in their sentiments, in relation to a National Bank, it must be of very recent origin. He must be permitted to premise, however, that, so far as he was able to judge, from correspondence, and the indications of the public press, the Bank and its friends were losing ground every day. He knew the people of his State were too much alive to their own interest, and too much enlightened, to be chained to the car of a United States Bank—to surrender the Government of the Constitution, bequeathed to them by their fathers, for that of a moneyed corporation.

Mr. NILES said that the petition which had just been read appears to have come from his own State, and he was sorry to perceive that it contained upon its face a statement which he believed to be entirely incorrect, and which was calculated to impose upon the Senate and the country. The petition states that it was signed by persons without distinction of party—a statement which he was persuaded could not be true in any proper sense of the language. He had not seen the names, and must move to have them read, that he might ascertain what truth there was in the statement to which he referred.

[Several Senators objected on account of the length of the list, and the time it would consume.]

Mr. N. said he would waive the motion then, and would repeat the expression of his decided opinion that the petition contained a false statement on its face. He thought he knew something of public opinion in his own State, and particularly of his political friends, who were almost unanimously opposed to a National Bank in any form. He knew something about this petition; it was, in his opinion, essentially a political manœuvre; it was started the very day after the election. One of the Senator's friends, a Whig of some distinction, and late president of a bank, the very day after the election, called on a venerable Democrat, one who was such in the days of JEFFERSON, and had maintained his integrity to this day, and urged him to sign a petition for a National Bank; the same, he presumed, now on our table. But this honest old Democrat discovered the design at once, and refused to sign it.

Sir, the object was to obtain a few names of the Democracy—some half a dozen might answer the purpose—a slight Democratic sprinkling, so as to give a color to the statement on the face of the petition that it was signed without distinction of parties. Whether any names had been obtained, enough to give the list the requisite sprinkling, he could not say, not having examined them; but if such was the fact, it would not bear out the statement that it was signed without distinction of parties. The question of a National Bank was in his State, and he believed in most others, distinctly and emphatically a party question: no one was more so, and yet Congress and the country are told that this petition comes here from both political parties. Sir, the statement is deceptive and essentially false, and he did not hesitate to pronounce it so.

Mr. CLAY of Ky. said it was signed by persons of every class in life, as was apparent from the signatures, and by persons of every party, Federal, Democratic, and, he dare say, Conservative. The fact was, that there was a succession of panics of late to the gentleman and his friends. They began in Maine, and had extended themselves to the Senator's own State, from whence they had reached to Mississippi.

Mr. NILES. The Senator complains that he (Mr. N.) had assailed a petition from his own constituents, and charged it with being false, without having examined it, and when it was evident, from his own remarks, that he had no means of knowing. Mr. N said he did not say that the general statements of the petition were false; most of the petition consists of opinions and arguments, and although he might dissent from them, he did not charge them with being false, he had only said that one statement, that which represented the memorial as emanating from both political parties, was deceptive, and essentially false. And he had not made this charge unadvisedly, or without good reasons; he had made it from his general knowledge of public sentiment, which was sufficient to justify him in saying that, in the fair and proper acceptation of the language, the statement could not be correct. But he had other reasons. The Senator's Whig friends were in the habit of practising tricks of this sort; they attempted to give this no-party character to a political meeting in his town last fall, at which certain political missionaries held forth, and abused the Administration in no measured terms; and even the Governor of the State, in his official message, declared that the recent election, which had brought him and the Legislature whom he addressed into power, was not to be regarded as a party triumph. This was a more solemn declaration than that in this petition, and was made in defiance of public opinion, when every man in the State knew that the contest had not only been a party struggle, in the ordinary sense, but that it had been characterized by a spirit of party violence and malignity, and by acts of coercion and oppression, never before witnessed in the State; and by practices which, if not amounting to bribery and corruption, certainly approached very near to them. Such abuses and outrages against the rights of suffrage had never before been witnessed in the State; there was something of the kind in 1834, although it fell greatly short of what had occurred in the late election, when all the banks had taken the field—some of their presidents being candidates for high offices—and had exerted all the influence that belongs to those powerful political engines. The banks could easily control the merchants and manufacturers, who were their debtors; who, in many instances, attempted to coerce and oppress the laborers in their employ. Factories were stopped, and business suspended, and honest laborers were given to understand that they could expect no further employment until there were better times, which could not be until there was a change of rulers. The bad times were charged entirely to the wicked measures of the Administration, and many honest persons were deceived into that belief. What misrepresentation and deception could not accomplish, was effected by intimidation, coercion, and oppression of the most outrageous character; the whole moneyed power of the State being brought to bear on public opinion in every possible way and form. Every interest was attempted to be subsidized, and a bait thrown out to every class: the railroad companies, a sectarian college, the Abolitionists, and all others, were to be gratified with all they asked, and all they desired, in case the Whigs succeeded. Well, sir, after an election had been carried by means like these, the people were insultingly told that it was not a party triumph, but a result brought about by a union of parties.

After all these promises, made so profusely and unscrupulously to all classes, we have seen, sir, how they have been fulfilled, and what Whig promises are worth. The Legislature have now been in session for four or five weeks, industriously employed, not in redeeming their pledges, but in devising excuses for violating them. They have found that it was one thing to make promises before elections, and another to fulfil them afterwards. But they have labored hard to do it, and shown a becoming zeal to restore the currency, regulate exchanges, and put an end to the hard times brought on by the wicked measures of this Administration; they have been very anxious to relieve the people from their distress and sufferings, but, unfortunately, have been unable to agree on the means of effecting so much good. But, finally, after a long and laborious struggle, they seemed to have decided on the proper measure for relieving the people, and bring about good times once more. This measure was also recommended on account of its consistency with Whig principles, and the perfect harmony it proved between their principles and practices; besides, it very happily illustrated their "spoils" doctrine, and their utter aversion to offices, office-holders, and office-seekers, of which we have heard so much. Well, sir, what do you think this wonderful measure is which is to relieve the people, restore the currency to a sound state, regulate the exchanges, revive business, set the factories going, and fulfil all the promises which had been made to the railroad companies, the friends of a college, the Abolitionists, the Conservatives, and all others? Why, sir, it is a very powerful and efficacious measure, and is nothing more nor less than a general sweep of all the Democrats from office. Now, sir, can any one doubt, that, according to the Whig creed, this wonderful remedy will afford immediate and universal relief to all classses, unless it be some few individuals who may think that they have not got their share of the spoils. It will set the currency and exchanges right, make an end of the panic, revive business, set the banks in motion, make money plenty, help every man to pay his debts, and produce general prosperity. This, sir, is the great universal Whig measure of relief, and is the only one which has been adopted, except an act to give greater indulgence to the banks, by authorizing them to issue small bills, without being compelled to redeem them.

Among other interests brought to bear on the election, was that of a National Bank; and immediately after, this petition was started. He regarded it as essentially a political movement, although he presumed that most of the signers honestly believed that a National Bank might be beneficial. Manufacturers, who sold their goods in other States, and who, in common with others, suffered from the deranged state of the currency, no doubt supposed that a bank would facilitate their remittances, and improve the domestic exchanges. In this he differed with them, but did not doubt their sincerity. If the petitioners have any interest in a bank, it must be from its supposed influence on the currency elsewhere, as it could have no beneficial effect in the State. The branch which was established there afforded no facilities whatever as to exchange, over the local banks; and, indeed, was generally thought not to be so favorable in its dealings.

He would state one fact, which would show how little interest was felt for a National Bank before it became a political question. No longer ago than 1832, a general meeting was held in his own town, attended by most of the cashiers of the local institutions, which adopted very strong resolutions against the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. N. said that whenever a memorial was introduced on that subject, and on almost all other occasions, it made little difference what, we had an eloquent and flourishing harangue from the Senator about the Bank, or a Bank, whose praises were daily sung, and in the same high key. He had heard this favorite tune of the gentleman so often, that it reminded him of what he lately read in a daily paper, (he hoped the Senator would not think he meant any offensive comparison,) of a negro fiddler, who was very proud of his skill, and constantly displaying it, yet could play but a single tune, called "Pea Straw." When any one asked him to try his hand, he promptly replied, "Very well, sir; will massa please have Pea Straw?" and immediately struck up the old tune. Now, sir, the honorable Senator is very much in the same condition. He seems to have but one tune; and although he plays that very skilfully, yet, as we hear it so often, and on all occasions, it is not surprising that we become a little tired of it. The mind likes variety; and whilst we admire the musical powers of the Senator, most of us would be better pleased if he would occasionally give us something besides the old Bank tune of Pea Straw, Pea Straw.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky observed that he could with pleasure say that he was on very good terms with the Senator from Connecticut, and hoped that they would part on as good terms on the fourth of March next. One thing the Legislature of Connecticut had done, besides turning out all those worthy Democrats; and that was, to deprive the Senate of the benefit of the gentleman's enlightened counsels. He knew nothing of the petitioners, but believed they were as respectable as any Senator here. He did not think it was consistent with the Senator's usual prudence to denounce as untrue what was deliberately asserted in that petition, without even knowing the names of the signers. He was perfectly willing to accommodate the Senator, and would hereafter endeavor to regale his ears with some other tune. But what had been sung by the Senator and his friends ever since the commencement of the session? Why, nothing but Sub-Treasury, Sub-Treasury.

Mr. NILES. The Senator informed him that he, (Mr. N.) seemed to forget one important measure, which the Legislature had adopted, which was, to decide that his services here should cease on the 4th of March next. Mr. N. was well aware of this important Whig measure, and thought he had not omitted it, as it was included in the great relief measure which he had named; a general sweep of all the friends of the Administration from office, certainly included himself, as he was pretty well understood to be one. Whether this measure will conduce to the interests of the State and the country, was not a question for him to decide. His course here had at least been open and fearless: he had endeavored to carry out the true Democratic principles of our system of Government, and to support such measures as he believed to conduce to the permanent and lasting interests of the country. On these principles and these measures, he was desirous to stand or fall. A majority of his State—an accidental or fortuitous majority, the result of a panic, as he believed—had decided against him, and he should cheerfully aquiesce in their decision. He had not the vanity to suppose that his services here were of much importance; and, as regarded himself, public life had no such charms as to give him a pang at leaving it; retirement to a private station had no terrors with him. But he had known some who had been for years talking about withdrawing from public life, who seemed desirous to impress the public with the belief that they were anxious to get rid of the cares and perplexities of public affairs, and that they were only waiting for a favorable opportunity to retire to the shades and repose of private life. Mr. N. said that he recollected that two years ago two distinguished members of this body, one distinguished as an orator, the other not less distinguished as a writer, intimated an intention of retiring from the Senate; and the Senator from Kentucky, who was one of the gentlemen, made frequent appeals to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HILL] to co-operate with him in several measures, so that they might unitedly render some little service to their country, before they withdrew from its councils. Well, sir, his friend from New Hampshire did retire, as he is very apt to act as he says he shall act, and is now chief magistrate of his State. And for many years before, the Senator, on many occasions, has distinctly intimated an intention to withdraw from the public councils of his country; he has endeavored to give an imposing effect to many speeches and many measures, on the ground of their being the last fruits of his experience and wisdom, as he was about to retire to the shades of Ashland. From time to time we have had "more of the last words of good old Richard Baxter" enforced by an affecting expression of anxiety for the seclusion, the repose, and the quiet, of the shades of Ashland. But still the favorable opportunity does not occur. The Senator is still as deeply and ardently engaged in the party strife as ever; he is still here, sir, and engaged at the old tune of the Bank, his favorite Pea Straw.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky would assure the worthy Senator from Connecticut that Ashland was a very pleasant place, and that he should be delighted to be there now to enjoy the comforts it is dispensing; and as the worthy Senator would have a good deal of leisure after the fourth of March next, he hoped to see him there, where he would be sure of being treated with the greatest kindness and hospitality. It was true he expressed an anxious and sincere wish to retire from the service of the public—a wish, which, if he should avow it now, the Senator would hardly give him credit for it. But there was one fact to which he would call the Senator's attention, and that was, he was here by compulsion, and the Senator would retire by compulsion, on the 4th of March next. He would advise the Senator to retire from public life in a philosophical temper, and not give way to splenetic and violent attacks on his own State. Why, the Senator had not even spared the Governor of his own State, and declared that his assertion, that he was elected by both parties, was wholly untrue. How was this? Were the Whigs in a majority in Connecticut? Was there no Conservatives there—no converted Loco Focos? Mr. C. protessted against the unworthy and unauthorized imputations that the Senator had cast on the Governor, Legislature, and citizens of his own State.

Mr. NILES. The Senator repeats his charge, that I must have done injustice to my own State which he attributes to personal disappointment. He speaks of certain illustrious names which conferred honor on the State, and alludes to two individuals now living, and formerly of this body, who, by the by, are not held in very high estimation by any party. Sir, (said Mr. N.) I have said nothing derogatory to the illustrious names to whom the Senator alluded, nor have I made any reflections on the character of the State. He thought he knew what was due to his State, to its interests, its reputation, its honor, and, to the best of his humble abilities, he had endeavored to defend them. He had spoken of certain dishonest practices which had been introduced since the corrupting influence of banks and money had been brought to bear on public sentiment, to subdue the public will and control elections. In reprobating these dishonest practices, so derogatory to the character of a free and enlightened people, he had vindicated the character of his constituents, who, being strictly a moral people, never could approve of such practices as prevailed at the late election. He spoke without reference to party; for he believed that the great mass of both parties will equally condemn all attempts through the power and influence of money to overthrow private opinion, and subvert the fundamental right of suffrage. He, with others, had struggled for years to secure an extension of that right, and is it now supposed the people of the State will submit to see it trampled in the dust by the insolent and debasing spirit of money? Far better would it have been that the elective franchise should have remained as it once was, confined to the freehold, than to be extended to all, to become the subject of traffic, coercion, and oppression, so far as respects the poor and dependant. There was no want of the spirit of individual independence among his constituents, and such abuses could not take place, except in times of panic and distress, when dependant laborers were out of employment, and struggling for bread.

Sir, the Senator has proffered me his advice, which is, that I will submit cheerfully and in good temper to the change which has taken place in my State, and retire with good feelings towards all, and not grumbling and complaining. The advice (Mr. N. said) was quite unnecessary, as he believed he had already evinced; still it was good, and he should certainly follow it. His maxim was never to despair of the Republic, and he had not the least reason in the world to do so, so far as respected his own State. He had every reason to be encouraged, as he had had abundant evidence that the reign of the Senator's friends would be brief as well as inglorious. If the Senator could see the facts contained in a letter he (Mr. N.) received by the last mail, giving an account of the proceedings of the Legislature, he would be satisfied that the triumph at which there had been such rejoicings could not last long; he would see that his friends were in great trouble and perplexity, and much in the condition of the banks, who were really their masters, having made many promises which they were unable to fulfil. He would find that, for their treachery, faithlessness, and cowardice, they were visited with complaints, both loud and deep, at every corner of the streets; not from political opponents, but from disappointed friends, to whom their promises had not been redeemed. He thought one year would be the extent of their power; it might continue longer; but he would assure the honorable Senator, for his special gratification, that there was not the least probability that it could hold hold out until the great struggle in 1840.

Sir, said Mr. N. as the honorable Senator has given me some advice, which I have received kindly and agreed to follow, I will return the favor by offering a little to him. I wish to remind the Senator, of what his long experience must have convinced him—that in this changing world politics were, of all things, the most unstable and fluctuating; that existing opinions and present appearances were often extremely deceptive, and frequently led to dangerous conclusions. Little reliance can be placed on results without looking at the causes which have produced them, and seeing whether they are abiding, or fleeting and transitory. He hoped the Senator would not suffer himself to be deceived by recent indications of public opinion, which may have proceeded from temporary causes. Public opinion is extremely fluctuating—principles alone are stable and immutable. There is, however, one thing as to which the great mass of the people never change. It was that to which he alluded in the first speech he delivered in the Senate, in attempting to explain the wonderful popularity of that venerable man who a year since retired from the public councils of his country for ever. That one thing, sir, is honesty. The people are honest, and they love honesty above all other things. They will forgive mistakes and errors in heir public servants; but if they find that they have been imposed upon, it is vain to think to maintain their confidence. If the present indications, apparently so auspicious to the Whig cause, are the result of a panic, of temporary causes—and still more, if they have been produced by deception, he warned the Senator that it would be very unsafe to build any hopes upon them.

There are some professions and some causes which flourish only in adverse and calamitous times. The medical profession, although one of great merit, we all know flourishes best when sickness and distress prevail. The harvest of the physician is gathered in seasons of pestilence, and amidst the sighs and groans of the sick and the anguish of surviving friends.

There are some causes, also, that thrive best in times of public distress and calamity. And the history of this country proves that this is the case with that cause which, let it exist under whatever name or form it may, combines the essential elements of aristocracy in our political system. This cause, originally known as Federalism, and since called by all sorts of names, which it is thought may disguise its real character, has always succeeded best in times of difficulty, embarrassment, and distress. Indeed, sir, it has never flourished at any other period.

When the country is in trouble, when business is at a stand, when the people are in difficulty, debt, and distress, this cause has flourished. Hence during the last war, when the country was almost sinking under a pressure of difficulties, struggling with the most powerful nation on earth, without revenue, and almost without credit, the cause of Federalism was prosperous beyond all former example. Receiving fresh vigor from the difficulties and distresses of the country, its power soon became formidable and almost irresistible. It prostrated every thing before it in the Eastern States. In his own State, the small, but fearless and patriotic band of Democrats, who dared to stand by their country when faction had pushed its measures to the very point of open resistance to the laws, were apparently so reduced in numbers that the violent party leaders of that day sneeringly said that there were not enough left to laught at.

But, sir, when the war terminated, when the dark cloud which had long hung over the country passed off, and the sun once more shone with brightness on our fair land, it was found that the Democracy were not dead, nor even asleep. Although they had never succeeded in the State, the very next year they came forth with an energy which broke the ranks of Federalism and prostrated all their strongholds of power.

The same occurred in his State and others after the memorable panic of 1834.

Sir, this cause, consisting of a combination of all the elements hostile to the popular principles in our Government, is at all times the same; and the history of the past is the prediction of the future. It is a cause that is nourished and sustained by the embarrassments and distresses of the people. It rises as the country sinks, and sinks as the country rises.

The recent embarrassments and distresses of the country have imparted to it that vigor which springs only from public difficultues. But as business revives, and industry returns to its accustomed channels; as the gloom and darkness passes away, as it soon must, the apparent bright prospects of this cause will disappear as has been the case on all former occasions. It is a cause that will not bear the light; that will not bear prosperity. And Democracy, oppressed and borne down by a temporary pressure, will rise invigorated by this suspended action, and by its own instinctive energies will spread wider and broader its influence in every direction, sweeping away every thing that opposes its progress, until it covers the whole land, and fills with joy the hearts of all who love liberty and their country.

After some further remarks from Mr. CLAY,

Mr. WRIGHT called for the reading of the New York petition, and it was accordingly read.

Mr. W. observed, that upon looking at this paper itself, he found that it was an old acquaintance—a sort of circular or travelling bank petition, of which he had seen several. The honorable Senator on his right had presented several of them, and this came from a most respectable town of his State. He was desirous of seeing what evidence there was that the signers to this petition had changed their political faith, and the only evidence he found was a note at the bottom of the petition, signed by one individual in initials, and which was not noticed by the signers themselves. The petition was a sort of lithograph, and every man into whose hands it came was entreated to disseminate it as widely as possible; but many of them he observed were signed by very few persons. He wished the petition to be printed with the names, and as there were not many, the expense would not be great. He wished it to be sent to Jamaica, in order that the people there might see who it came from. When he heard the presentation of this petition this morning, he must say that he supposed it was a new one, and came fresh from the people. He saw so much exhilaration in the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that he could have no other opinion; but he now saw that the letter enclosing it was dated the first of March, which was long before the Senator's project of a National Bank was heard of. He should not have asked the question he did, if he had known that the petition resulted from a state of things existing before the Senator broached his project. The Senator gave as a reason why the country wanted a National Bank, the great inequality of bank paper. Now he recollected that it was not very long ago that an attempt was made to force the Treasury to receive this depreciated paper. Now if this paper was so very depreciated as to be shaved twice, they ought to rejoice that the attempt had failed.

The question was then taken, and both petitions, with the names, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of Jacob Gideon, sr. of this city, praying payment of arrears of pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Alvin Mitchell, of Mobile, praying confirmation of title to a tract of land: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of sundry citizens of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the execution of the Cherokee treaty: laid on the table.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported several bills from the House without amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making provision for the adjustment of the title to the site of a light house on Roanoke Marshes, North Carolina: read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported the bill from the House for the relief of Elias Eastman, without amendment.

The bills for the relief of Sandy Walker, Elizabeth French, Richard Hall, John Midwinter, Myron Chapin, and Samuel M. Asbury, also received from the House, were reported, and their indefinite postponement recommended.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to grant to Cherokee county, Alabama, a certain tract of land: read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. WEBSTER, was, after being modified by him, adopted.

The bill in regard to the town of Southport, in the Territory of Wisconsin, was read the third time, and after a debate, in which Messrs. SEVIER, BUCHANAN, CALHOUN, CLAY of Alabama, KING, WHITE, and WEBSTER, took part, passed—yeas 24, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Trotter, Wall, Webster, White, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Lumpkin, Niles, Pierce, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Tipton, Williams, and Wright—12.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the following bills were severally taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill concerning a seminary of learning in the Territory of Wisconsin.

The joint resolution to disapprove, and disaffirm an act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Wisconsin, chartering the Bank of Prairie du Chien.

The bill to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in the opening of a canal to unite the waters of Green Bay and Rock river.

The bill from the House to require the Judge of the district courts of East and West Tennessee, to hold a court at Jackson, in said State, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill to authorize the Portage Canal Company to enter a quantity of land at the Wisconsin and Fox river portage, was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 1, 1838.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, on leave, presented the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to John P. Eastman, of Cornish, Maine.

Mr. PATTERSON, on leave, offered the following resolution; which was agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Darien Centre, via Pembroke, to Alabama, in the county of Genesee, New York.

LAKE SURVEYS.

The first business in order was the following resolution, reported yesterday from the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to the House of Representatives, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a copy of each survey, and chart accompanying the same, that has been heretofore made, of the shores, harbors, inlets, and waters of Lake Erie; also, a copy of each similar survey that has been made of Lake Michigan.

Two amendments were pending, one by Mr. BRONSON, to insert "Lake Ontario," and the other by Mr. CRARY, to include "Lake Huron."

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, stated that he had prepared a substitute which would cover the whole ground, but while the amendments were pending he could not do so.

Mr. BRONSON said in order to remove this embarrassment, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then submitted his proposition as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause such parts of Lakes Ontario, Erie, St. Clair, Huron, Michigan, and Champlain, and the bays contiguous, and the rivers and straits connected with said lakes, as are within the United States, to be surveyed, when he may deem the same to be necessary to add security and safety to the navigation or commerce on those waters, or for any naval or military operations that may be required on the same for the protection and defence of the northern frontier, and accurate maps and charts of such surveys to be made; and for that purpose he is hereby authorized to employ any public vessel or craft within those waters; and to detail for such service such persons as are employed on board of such vessels or crafts, and others in public employ, when the same can be done without injury to other branches of the public service; and that he cause the shoals, rocks, and other obstructions, and the channels into the bays, mouths of rivers, and through the straits, when said channels are intricate, to be designated by buoys, or in such other suitable manner as he may direct.

Mr. WISE moved to include "the waters of the Chesapeake bay, and the creeks adjacent thereto," and said a few words in support of it.

Mr. WHITTLESEY opposed its introduction in this resolution, as not connected with the subject, though he was willing to vote for a survey for the waters of the Chesapeake bay to any extent.

Mr. WISE rejoined, and said he proposed for this bay nothing more than the gentleman proposed for the lakes. For himself, he was opposed to the principle of making these surveys, and so were his constituents, but as Northern gentleman would have them on their waters, those of the South would have them on theirs.

Mr. BRONSON replied that the gentleman had misconceived the object of the resolution. The gentleman thought it contemplated large expenditures. It did no such thing; so far from that, it did not contemplate the expenditure of a single dollar, for it only proposed the employment of the Government vessels and officers who were already on the spot.

After some further remarks from Mr. B. and Mr. CUSHMAN, in relation to another matter referred to the Committee on Commerce, Mr. B. said he had no very particular objection to the amendment, if it only proposed, as the original resolution did, merely to employ the vessels already stationed there.

Mr. MALLORY, alluding to the little that had been done in the coast survey, said he should vote against Mr. WHITTLESEY's proposition unless Mr. WISE's was agreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE begged Mr. WISE to withdraw it, and submit it as a distinct resolution, when it should have Mr. F's cordial support.

Mr. REED deprecated the local jealousies and distinctions Southern gentlemen had drawn.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then accepted Mr. WISE's amendment.

Mr. STANLEY moved to include Albemarle, Pamlico and Cove Sound.

Mr. C. SHEPARD suggested there were other sounds requiring to be surveyed in North Carolina, as well as those indicated by his colleague.

At this stage the CHAIR announced the special order, being the

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOWARD in the chair, on the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837.

The question was on the amendment submitted on the 21st inst. by Mr. BELL.

Mr. TURNEY concluded his remarks in reply to Mr. BELL, in the course of which he commented upon that gentleman's course at different periods of his political career with great severity.

Mr. BELL rejoined, and commenced by saying he hoped he should be indulged with an opportunity to rejoin to the unprovoked attack of his colleague. He said that his personal relations with his colleague had not been familiar, but had always been civil, and not unpleasant. He knew but little of his course previous to meeting him upon that floor, and did not suppose his attack was dictated by personal malice or ill will. He looked upon him as the voluntary scavenger of others, not acting from the promptings of his own heart, but as the fit, apt, voluntary conduit of the malice of others. He had found the political associates of the gentleman, in the House and out of it, equally destitute of private honor or public principle. He had so charged of them and against them in his own district, and in the vicinity of their homes, among their neighbors; but they were never willing to meet him there nor here. He hoped they would meet him him privately and personally, and not continue to make these attacks upon the floor of the House. He had accused them at home and here of bad faith, falsehood, and hypocrisy, but they had never thought fit to meet him there or here. He repeated that he did not think his colleague [Mr. TURNEY] was actuated by private malice, but was the willing, voluntary instrument of others, the tool of tools.

Mr. TURNEY. It is false! it is false!

Mr. STANLEY called Mr. TURNEY to order.

At the same moment both gentlemen were perceived in personal conflict,* and blows with the fist were aimed by each at the other. Several members interfered, and suppressed the personal violence; others called order, order, and some called for the interference of the SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER hastily took the chair, and insisted upon order; but both gentlemen continued struggling, and endeavoring, notwithstanding the constraint of their friends, to strike each other.

The SPEAKER called upon the Sergeant-at-Arms to preserve order; which, without the interference of that officer, was restored.

The SPEAKER then read the rule of the Manual applicable to the case, which rule requires that in a case of personal contest, both parties shall be required to give a pledge to the House that they would carry the matter no further; and that the precedent in such a case, was that the Speaker took the Chair to preserve order, and the House adjourned.

Mr. HOWARD made an explanation, that the unfortunate occurrence, which he deeply regretted, had occurred so promptly, suddenly, and unexpectedly, that, though disposed to preserve order, he had not an opportunity to interpose before the SPEAKER had taken the chair, as was his right and duty; the regular officer of the House, elected to preside over their deliberations, having more power and influence than a mere temporary chairman of a committee, not elected by the House itself.

Mr. WISE remarked that there had been a sudden excitement, which had already blown over. If any excitement existed, there was no exhibition of it. He would propose, as the best mode, for the House to go into committee again. That, he thought, would be the best way to get rid of the subject.

The SPEAKER said his impression was that would be the best mode.

Mr. MERCER referred to his having made an attempt to get the rule of the House enforced on a former occasion, in which he failed; he would not make the attempt now, but he considered that the rules of the House were the laws of the House; and unless the House would enforce its laws, he would not remain a member of it.

The SPEAKER was about to put the question upon going into committee, when

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont said, that as a new member, it might, perhaps, be deemed unbecoming in him to express an opinion on a subject like this, in the presence of older members; but it did appear to him, and he could not avoid expressing it, that to go into committee now would not be respectful to the House itself. The privileges of the House had been trampled upon, to say the least of this painful occurrence; and he desired to see those privileges respected. Mr. F. was proceeding, when

The CHAIR pronounced him to be out of order, as no proposition was pending.

Mr. FLETCHER explained that his remarks were in reference to the motion to go into committee; but as he had said, substantially, all he intended, he would, therefore, take his seat.

Mr. YELL expressed an earnest hope that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] would not make any distinct proposition of the character he had adverted to. It might seem a little extraordinary that a gentleman from Arkansas should get up there as a peace-maker, but nevertheless it was so, and as such he entreated Mr. M. not to present his proposition, for Mr. Y. was convinced the matter could be quieted and settled without further difficulty. He had the pleasure of knowing both gentlemen, and had known them long; and he well knew, too, that if the House attempted to carry out Mr. M's proposition, these two gentlemen would be severed so far asunder that they would never come together again; and that which was the result of temporary heat, would be converted into a lasting difference. Mr. Y. was in favor of Mr. WISE's motion, as the best mode of disposing of the matter, for, to discuss such a subject in the House, would be to commit both gentlemen.

Mr. WISE remarked, that he felt thankful to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. YELL,] for his suggestion. He had always found that such interference had always produced more excitement; and from the age and standing of both the gentlemen, the House might feel sure that such proceeding was unnecessary. He felt sure that both felt ashamed of the hasty occurrence, and that both were already more punished than they would be by any action of the House in the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. DUNCAN asked if the question was not upon going into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER said a question of privilege would override that motion.

Mr. MERCER said he was preparing a proposition, if he could have time, and in a few moments he offered the following:

Resolved, That warm words and a mutual assault having passed between two members of this House, viz: the Hon. JOHN BELL and the Hon. HOPKINS L. TURNEY, of the State of Tennessee, they be called upon by the Speaker to declare in their places that they will not prosecute the quarrel between them any further.

* Mr. BELL gave the first blow.

Mr. POTTER moved to lay this resolution on the table.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays; which were refused.

Mr. MERCER called for tellers; which were ordered, and were—yeas 80, noes 52.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

After some conversation respecting the situation of the bill, &c. between Messrs. SHEPARD, BRONSON, and BOULDIN,

Mr. PENNYBACKER submitted the following resolution:

The Hon. H. L. TURNEY and the Hon. JOHN BELL having violated the privilege of this House, by assaulting each other in the House whilst sitting, it is, therefore,

Resolved, That the said H. L. TURNEY and JOHN BELL do apologise to the House for violating its privilege and offending its dignity.

Mr. P. said it was a farce to have laws unless they were to be enforced, and he insisted that it was the duty of the House to enforce the rule.

Mr. YELL inquired if the resolution was not the same as the one offered by Mr. MERCER.

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr. YELL then moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. GRANT called for the yeas and nays; and while the Clerk was calling the names of members—

Mr. WISE rose, and said it was unnecessary to go through with the proceedings, for he was authorized by both the gentlemen to say that they were both ready to volunteer their apologies to the House.

The suspension of the call being objected to, it was completed, and resulted—yeas 21, nays 155.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BELL and Mr. TURNEY severally made their submissions to the House, for their violation of order in its committee, both of them disclaiming, in the most unqualified terms, the remotest intention of violating the rules ond orders of the House.

The foregoing resolution of Mr. PENNYBACKER was then, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, laid on the table without a division, and,

On motion of Mr. WISE, the House again went into committee.

Mr. BELL resumed his remarks, and went into a reply in full, to the allegations of Mr. TURNEY, and other charges made against him at home, for the purpose of vindicating his previous course, and exonerating his character.

Mr. BELL having concluded his remarks, Mr. UNDERWOOD followed briefly, and Mr. HALSTEAD at length, when the pending amendment of Mr. BELL was agreed to—77 to 70.

Mr. CAMBRELENG wished the question taken again, for he was convinced the committee must have voted under a misapprehension of the question. The amendment now agreed to was the amendment of Mr. BELL, moved on his own responsibility, and not the amendment moved, or to be moved, by the same gentleman, under the instructions of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which the committee supposed they had been voting upon,

Mr. EVERETT suggested that the vote could be taken in the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG appealed to some gentleman who had voted with the majority to move a reconsideration, and asked Mr. BELL if he did not intend to move the amendment of his committee.

Mr. ANDERSON stated that, having voted under a misapprehension, for he had supposed the question was on the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, he, therefore, moved a reconsideration.

Mr. DROMGOOLE raised the point whether a motion to reconsider was in order in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR ruled it to be so, on the ground that the same orders and rules governing the House were applicable in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARLAND of Lousiana appealed from that decision.

Mr. BELL would obviate the difficulty by moving the amendment of the Indian Committee; as to the point raised, his own opinion was that a motion to reconsider could not be made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARLAND withdrew his appeal; though he was satisfied the point raised ought to be sustained.

Mr. ANDERSON also withdrew his motion to reconsider, and

Mr. BELL then submitted the amendment, which was as follows, and which he had been instructed to move by the Committee on Indian Affairs:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars be appropriated, in full, for all the objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal West: Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided, further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appropriation unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the President shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the Government.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That, for satisfying all claims for arrearages of annuities, for supplying blankets and other articles of clothing for the Cherokees who are able to supply themselves and which may be necessary for their comfortable removal, and for medicines and medical assistance, and for such other purposes as the President shall deem proper to facilitate the removal of the Cherokees, one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. B. so modified the amendment as to insert, where requisite, the words "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. WISE merely wished to say that it was his intention, before the committee rose, to have replied briefly to some of the gentlemen who had followed him upon the Cherokee question; but, in the desire expressed on all sides to take this question for several evenings past, he would forego the privilege of rejoining to them as he had intended. It had also been his intention to have taken a full review of the Florida war, and to have shown the manner in which that war had been conducted, and the results it had brought about. He had intended to have made clear every proposition which he asserted when the first bill appropriating a million of dollars for that war was under consideration, that that war was iniquitous in its inception, more iniquitous in its conduct, and more disastrous in its results, and disgraceful to us as a nation, and that the expenditures of that war have been most extravagant and profligate. He was prepared also with official documents to show that it had been a most brutal and inhuman war, costing this Government millions of treasure and the most precious blood, and that it ought not to be prosecuted in the manner it had heretofore been, but he would not detain the committee after the numerous cries for question.

In reference to the vote on the former bill, the official organ had stated that Mr. W. was in his seat, and skulked from the responsibility of voting on it. That assertion was false. He never should have skulked from such a vote as that. Never, and if he were to be alone, the only man among the representatives of these people, he would stand by the declaration for ever, that he would not vote another dollar for such a war. No, he would arrest it at once, and order all our forces to return from Florida instantly, except what were barely sufficient to protect and restrain the white man from the Indians. It would be one of the proudest acts of his life, one of the proudest votes of his public life, to stand alone upon the journals on such a question. He would not, when humanity, when justice, when every moral and sacred obligation due to the country and to man, called for its discontinuance, longer wage such a war.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT moved an additional item of $20,000 to defray the expense of making treaties with certain hostile Indian tribes: lost.

Mr. WISE offered an amendment to be renewed in the House, which was also disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then rose, nem diss. and the bill and amendments were reported to the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to non-concur in Mr. BELL'S own amendment, and to concur in that of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The effect of the former, he explained, would be, if adopted, to renew the negotiations under the treaty.

Mr. POPE had intended to address the House at some length, but would forego it in the anxious desire evinced on all sides to take the question. He adverted to one point, which was the assumption of power on the part of the President in ordering troops to the Cherokee country, without previous and special authority to do so. There was nothing in the Constitution nor in the laws which warranted him in do soing. He wished to move that the bill and amendments be printed.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House adjourn: lost—ayes 74, noes 81.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had seen a letter from a distinguished officer now in the Cherokee country, which stated that, whilst the Cherokees did not intend to resist, neither did they intend to move one muscle; and Mr. T. would say that, unless the Indians were in some degree propitiated, it would cost ten times the amount to coerce them. He appealed, therefore, to every man, whether those who had been so eloquent in behalf of these poor Indians, or those who had the feelings of men about them, whether they would not prefer giving a sum for reconciliation and conciliation than for massacre and murder.

Mr. UNDERWOOD remarked that the amendment was not inconsistent with the provisions of the bill in other parts.

Mr. HOWARD said, that as he understood the amendment, it would empower the President to apply the money as appropriated in the bill, and to expend the two millions appropriated in the amendment also.

Mr. REED called upon the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to give the evidence upon which he had intimated that a war might break out suddenly between two States on matters provided for in the bill; and on account of which anticipated war, he pressed the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, after commenting slightly upon the manner in which the call had been made, said that all the Indian wars had arisen from the conduct of the whites, or of those who, like the gentleman's friend, John Ross, were seven-eighths white.

Mr. REED disclaimed any acquaintance with John Ross, and did not know on what ground the gentleman [Mr. C.] had called him his [Mr. R's] friend. He complained that an intimation had been made to the House that a war between two States was likely to break out, and that th House was left in the dark upon the subject.

Mr. POPE proposed to amend the amendment, so as to make it read any sum "not exceeding" two millions, so as to leave it discretionary with the President to act as circumstances might require. It was stated by the Secretary that the Indians would be satisfied with the bill; and if so, the additional appropriation would be unnecessary.

Mr. McKAY said he hoped the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole would not be concurred in. He was opposed to giving any more than was stipulated in the treaty. He understood that the provisions of the bill would be satisfactory to the Indians; and he had no doubt that if the hope of gaining more was held out as in this amendment, they would of course wait, and refuse to remove peaceably, until they could obtain the additional sum of two millions; so that it would operate as a substantial addition of two millions to the appropriations which it was represented would be satisfactory to the Cherokees.

Mr. PENNYBACKER rose to express the hope that the proviso which had been adopted in the Committee of the Whole, on the motion of Mr. BELL, would not be agreed to by the House. It avowed the purpose of enabling the President to allow the Indians two millions of dollars, as "an additional compensation for the lands ceded to the United States" by the treaty of 1835. This was obviously going behind the treaty, and inculcating the belief that the treaty was not binding. It was bad policy for the House, at any time, to inquire into the validity of a treaty which had been ratified according to the requirements of the law; but it was particularly impolitic in this case, as all the evidence which had been adduced here to show that that alleged treaty was, in fact, no treaty, had been before the Senate, and had been maturely considered by them before they ratified it. But he had another objection to the proviso. It contravened the policy of the Executive, and defeated the hopes of the people of Georgia. A commanding general had been sent among the Indians, with instructions to remove them as speedily as possible. That officer had notified them that they must be prepared to go before the "next full moon." Now, what did the proviso do? It said, "if the President shall ascertain that all discontent and further opposition," etc. "can be allayed or evaded, by allowing an additional compensation," etc. he was thereby authorized to apply two millions of dollars to that object. Was not this holding out to the Indians an inducement to remain in their country until the President should have an opportunity to ascertain if "all discontent and further opposition", etc. could not be "allayed or avoided," by allowing the two millions of dollars, as "an additional compensation," etc.? Clearly it was. Ross, it was agreed on all hands, was a very shrewd fellow; and he would assuredly find out what it was the interest of his people to do, under the terms of the proviso. But Mr. P. had still further objections. The proviso gave more money than he was willing to give. The subject had been before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and had been maturely considered by that committee. They had recommended the appropriation of only one million one hundred and forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars for the peaceable removal of the Indians. That was enough, in all conscience. He had had great difficulty in prevailing upon himself to give that sum; and his difficulty had been overcome only by the hope that the boon would prove effectual as a peace offering. If, on the terms of the proviso, the Indians should remove, they would not only be entitled to the sum which the President would agree to give them, but they would also reap the benefit of the sum recommended by the committee. That Mr. P. never could agree to.

It was idle to suppose that, by adopting the proviso, a saving to the Government would be effected While the Indians were waiting to extort from the President the largest sum which he would be authorized to give them, the army would necessarily have to be kept in their country to see if they would ultimately go. Thus, in any event, the expense of the army would have to be incurred.

For these reasons, Mr. P. hoped that the proviso would not be concurred in.

Mr. WISE said that when the committee were about to rise, he desired to make some remarks in conclusion of the debate; but knowing that gentlemen were weary of the debate, he was willing to yield to their wishes, and suppress his observations; and he did so upon what he supposed the express understanding that no debate was to be had in the House. Since the bill had been reported, however, gentlemen got up on every side, and ound ten thousand mares' nests; and after the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. McKay,] he should go on with the speech he had intended to make. He had been willing to abide by the implied agreement that the debate should cease, but he could not allow the observations o the gentleman [Mr. McKay] to pass without a reply. He then gave way to

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, who moved an adjournment.

Mr HUNTER of Ohio called for the yeas and nays, which were refused—ayes 29, noes 124.

Mr. PETRIKIN call for tellers, which were ordered and appointed, and after division, they reported—ayes 88, noes 81. So the House adjourned at about 8 o'clock, p. m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 1, 1838.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill from the other House, to require the judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for East and West Tennessee to hold their courts at Jackson, in said State, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported unfavorably on several memorials that had been referred to that committee.

The following bills were severally read the third time, and passed:

The bill to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin, to aid in opening a canal to unite the waters of Lake Michigan and Rock river.

The bill concerning a seminary of learning in the Territory of Wisconsin; and

The joint resolution disapproving and disaffirming an act of the Legislative Council of Wisconsin, chartering a bank.

The bill to incorporate the Navy Yard Beneficial Society of the city of Washington, was taken up, and considered as in the Committee of the Whole; and, on motion of Mr. NORVELL, laid on the table.

The bill to authorize the managers of the Washington Monument Society to erect a monument to the memory of Washington, on the public grounds, was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. SPENCE, laid on the table.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to third reading:

The bill to remit or refund the duties to the Baltimore and Susquehannah Railroad Company, upon the importation of iron made by them for the use of said railroad.

The bill for the relief of John McLeod.

The bill for the relief of William Tharp.

The bill to authorize the location of the preemption certificates, given by the Register of the Land Office at Batesville, in Arkansas, under the act of May 26, 1834, on any of the public lands for sale in the State of Arkansas; and

The bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act for her admission into the Union, to be applied to the making of a road or roads leading to said State.

IOWA TERRITORY.

The Senate took up, as the order of the day, the bill to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and to establish the Territorial Government of Iowa; and, after various amendments,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to amend the bill by making the tenure of office of the judges during good behavior, instead of for four years, as in the bill.

Mr. SEVIER opposed the motion, and spoke of the inconvenience of having officers for life, who must be continued in office, no matter how unqualified, unless they could be convicted under an impeachment, which was exceedingly difficult to be done. He thought it the safest practice that the tenure of office for all the public servants should be for short periods.

Mr. NORVELL said, that if any defect or inconvenience resulted from the tenure of good behavior, prescribed in this bill as the tenure by which the judges of the Territory of Iowa were to hold their offices, the fault was in the Constitution of the United States. The first section of the third article of that instrument provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." The judges of the Territories are the United States judges, appointed by the President and Senate, under the authority of laws of the United States. If they are not United States judges, they must be foreign judges, or no judges at all. In the Government of the Northwestern Territory, the first Territorial Government established by the United States, and established in the same year in which the Constitution was framed, a provision is found constituting a court of three judges; "and their commissions shall continue in force during good behavior." This may be considered a cotemporaneous interpretation of the constitutional provision in relation to the tenure and character of the judicial office in the Territories of the United States. He considered the Constitution clear upon this subject. While, therefore, he should, if unrestrained by that instrument, be in favor of a term of years, instead of the term for life, he could not consent to vote for the amendment which proposed to limit the tenure of these Iowa judges to four years. He well knew, brief as had been his service here, how utterly useless it was to invoke the Constitution on any subject, and how little influence it exercised on our proceedings; but, for himself, he must obey, on his occasion, what he believed to be its fair and clear injunction on this question.

Messrs. ALLEN and MORRIS opposed the motion, contending that the provision in the Constitution referred to by the Senator from Michigan, did not apply to the Territories.

On taking the question, the motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama was lost.

After various amendments, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LYON, the bill to settle contested claims arising under the pre-emption laws was taken up, and the amendment offered yesterday by Mr. L. being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LYON, the bill for the relief of Gurdon S. Hubbard, assignee of Jacques Veaux and Louis Veaux was taken up and considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. TROTTER, the bill to reorganize the District Courts of the State of Mississippi was taken up, and after a brief explanation from Mr. T. ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill making appropriations for arrearages due for the completion of certain roads in Michigan was taken up, and after being advocated by Messrs. NORVELL and LYON, and opposed by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana and BAYARD, laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which

It adjourned over till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 2, 1838.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the Indian hostility bill, and amendments made thereto, in Committee of the Whole, were ordered to be printed. Mr. C. explained that he made the motion on account of the confusion that had grown out of the misconception of the amendments.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Executive communications:

1. A message from the President of the United States, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, in answer to their resolution of the 28th instant, relative to the claim in the case of the ship Mary, and cargo, of Baltimore.

Respectfully submitted,

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

2. The following from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th instant, regarding the annexation of the Republic of Texas to the United States, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

M. VAN BUREN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 31, 1838.

To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th instant, requesting the President to communicate to that House, if not incompatible with the public interests, any correspondence not heretofore communicated, between this Government and that of the Republic of Texas, and also with the Government of any other country, relating to the annexation of the said Republic of Texas to the United States; and to inform the House whether the application for the said Government of Texas, to the United States, for admission to this Union, has been withdrawn, has the honor to report to the President, that all the correspondence between this Government and that of Texas, respecting the annexation of that Republic to the United States, has been already communicated to the House of Representatives, and that the proposition of annexation, made by the Texan Government, having been disposed of in that correspondence, has not been since deemed within the control of the United States.

No correspondence upon the subject of such annexation has taken place between this Government and that of any other country.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3. The following communication from the Secretary of War:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 1, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, furnishing, as accurately as the duties pressed by the Department will admit of, the information called for by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, in respect to the valuation of improvements, and the amounts paid thereon, under the Cherokee treaty of 1835.

Very respectfully,
Your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The following information was contained in a communication accompanying the above:

1. That the improvements valued under the Cherokee treaty of 1835 amount to about one million of dollars.

2. The amount of money paid for such improvements is not in all cases to be ascertained. These, with other allowances for spoliations, ferries, etc. constituted the credits to individual Indians; debts and other claims allowed by the board are charged against them, and the balance only is paid, if any remains. It is estimated that the payments equal eight hundred thousand dollars.

On motion of Mr. BELL, laid on the table.

TREASURY BUILDING.

Mr. LINCOLN asked leave to submit a resolution setting apart Monday next, from 10 till 1 o'clock, for the consideration of the bill to provide for the removal of the walls of the new Treasury building.

Mr. YELL, Mr. CAMBRELENG, and Mr. HAYNES simultaneously objected.

Mr. LINCOLN gave notice that, if the House would consent to take up the resolution, he would accept any modification of it as to time. He then moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of a memorial presented from the operatives on the structure some days ago; and it was read.

Mr. YELL inquired if it would not be equally in order to have read the petition from the people of the western frontier for protection? a subject of far more importance than a building job in this District.

The CHAIR remarked that the other petition had been read by unanimous consent.

The House then suspended the rules: yeas 98, nays 46; and the resolution being then taken up—

Mr. YELL moved to include the bill to extend for twelve months the farther time for locating Lovely donation claims in Arkansas.

Mr. CUSHMAN sent a substitute to the CHAIR, but it was pronounced out of order.

Mr. CRAIG then demanded the previous question, but withdrew it to enabe Mr. LINCOLN, at the suggestion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, to modify the resolution by making it Friday next from 10 till 1 o'clock. Motions were severally made by Mr. YELL and Mr. CUSHMAN, to lay the resolution on the table; and, Mr. CRAIG having renewed it, the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, put, and agreed to.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BIRDSALL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, on leave, reported a bill extending the benefits of the resolve of Congress of 24th August, 1780, to persons entitled to the same on account of the services and death of Lieut. Edward Wade; which, on motion of Mr. B. was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, to which was committed all bills from the same committee, and which, under the special order of the House, are to be considered this day.

Mr. GRENNELL asked leave to move to include in the special order of to-day three bills for the relief of widows of officers of the army.

Mr. CRAIG felt compelled to object to any further postponement of that order; whereupon,

Mr. GRENNELL moved a suspension of the rules; which was agreed to, and the resolution received.

Mr. MORGAN moved to amend it by including, also, the bill to compensate pension agents; but the House rejected it, and then agreed to Mr. G's resolution.

This being the day set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims,

Mr. TAYLOR moved the House to go into Committee on the Union on such of the bills embraced in the special order as were referred to.

Mr. CRAIG moved a call of the House.

Mr. DUNCAN moved an adjournment; which motion was carried in the negative—ayes 42, noes 50.

The question recurring on the call of the House, it was put and carried in the affirmative, without a division.

The CLERK was about to call the roll, when

Mr. DAWSON moved that all further proceedings in the call be suspended, stating that a quorum would soon be in the hall, and the business might be proceeded with in the mean time. The motion was refused.

The list having been called through, a motion was made to suspend further proceedings in the call; which was again rejected.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, June 4, 1838.

At the suggestion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, the House took up a number of Senate bills lying on the SPEAKER'S table, and they were read twice and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication transmitting a report in reference to the contemplated bridge across the Ohio river at Wheeling; which, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that, as soon as the call for petitions was through, he should move to take up the public business.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the order of states and Territories, and were presented as follows:

MAINE.—Messrs. PARRIS, ANDERSON, EVANS, and NOYES.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.—Mr. WILLIAMS.

[Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition for a mail route leading from Landaff, New Hampshire, to Franconia, New Hampshire.]

[Mr. ADAMS said he had in his possession certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, similar to those which had been presented, and withdrawn last week by his colleague, [Mr. CALHOUN,] asking for the rescinding of Mr. PATTON'S resolution, of 21st of December last. He did not intend to offer the resolutions at this time, but should await the decision of the House upon the resolution offered by his colleague, [Mr. CALHOUN,] declaratory of the resolution of Mr. PATTON; that resolutions of State Legislatures were not to be included in the rule established by that resolution respecting petitions. Before offering the resolutions of the Massachusetts Legislature, he wished to know whether a resolution of the Legislature of a State of this Union were to be treated with respect or contempt.]

CONNECTICUT—Mr. INGHAM.

[Mr. INGHAM presented a set of resolutions of the General Assembly of Connecticut, requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from that State to use their influence to procure the passage of a law to indemnify the citizens of the United States for losses sustained by them from the French prior to September 30, 1800. Also, a preamble and set of resolutions of the same General Assembly, declaring that the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States of the 21st December last, relating to petitions, memorials, and papers, touching the abolition of slavery, etc. in any State, Territory, or District of the United States, etc. is a virtual denial of the right of petition, subversive of the freedom of debate, and an infringement of the rights of the people of Connecticut, by refusing to hear and consider the petitions of a large number of them; and solemnly protesting against said resolution, in the name of the people of said State, as a usurpation of power, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, subversive of the fundamental principles of free Government, at war with the prerogatives of the people, and dangerous to the Union; and resolving that while they recognise the peculiar rights of other members of this Confederacy, they cannot consent to any interference with the rights of the people of that State. They therefore request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from said State to use their best exertions to cause the said resolution of the 21st December last to be rescinded, and also to lay the said preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut before Congress. Both of which sets of resolutions were, on motion of Mr. I. laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.]

NORTH CAROLINA—Messrs. McKAY and SHEPPERD.

[Mr. McKAY presented a memorial from Francis P. Blair, praying relief for reasons therein set forth, for a judgment obtained against him as one of the sureties of a Postmaster in Kentucky, when the loss accrued by the depreciation of bank paper. Another branch of the memorial prayed for an investigation into the manner in which Mr. B. had executed the public printing.

The first part was referred to the Post Office, and the second to a select committee.

At a subsequent stage of the day's proceedings, however,

Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia moved a reconsideration of the vote by which a part of the memorial had been referred to a select committee, and asked for the then consideration of that motion, but it being objected to, it therefore lies over, to come up on the next petition day. The motion does not affect the first branch of the memorial.]

GEORGIA.—Mr. DAWSON.

[Mr. DAWSON presented a petition, in behalf of Mrs. Nancy Irwin, and her orphan children, of Stewart county, Georgia, praying Congress to relieve the estate of her deceased husband, who was killed in the battle of Shepherd's Plantation, from its liability for the payment of a balance due as postmaster, &c. the same being lost in consequence of Indian depredations as is supposed.]

On motion of Mr. LYON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions inquire into the expediency of repealing the law requiring pensioners who fail to claim payment of their pensions for the space of — months, to apply at the Treasury Department for payment, and of making provision by law for their payment at the most convenient pension agency, upon satisfactory proof of their identity, and explanation of the cause of any delay in obtaining payment, or of making such provision by law as will authorize the pension agents to issue to pensioners orders or drafts on the Treasury Department for the amount due them.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, the following resolution, submitted by him on the 19th March, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying the judiciary system of the United States, so as to abolish the chancery practice in the courts of the United States for the State of Louisiana, and provide that the mode of proceedings in the said courts shall be in conformity to the laws of said State.

On his further motion, the resolution was then modified by adding at the end thereof the following:

"And also, that the said committee inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the 30th section of an act of Congress entitled, "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," approved September 24, 1789, as dispenses with the notice to parties according to the provisions of said act, when they reside at a distance of more than one hundred miles from the place of trial."

The resolution as thus modified was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route as follows, in the Territory of Florida: from Haddock's to Jefferson, in Georgia; from Monticello, by the Mineral Springs, to Jacksonville; from Tallahasse, by Iola, to St. Josephs.

BOOKS FOR MEMBERS.

Pending the call for petitions—

Mr. CUSHING asked leave to offer the following joint resolution:

Clark and Force; and that he deliver a like number of copies to each of those officers, of every succeeding volume of that work, as soon as may be after the same shall have been delivered to him by the publishers.

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby directed, of the copies so furnished, to distribute one to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to each Territorial delegate of the 23d, 24th, and 25th Congresses, who are not entitled to receive the same under some former act or resolution of Congress.

Objection being made,

Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules; which prevailed—ayes 101, noes not counted.

The resolution was then read twice, and the question being on its engrossment,

Mr. BOND asked for the yeas and nays; but the House refused, and the other stage was passed to instanter, and the resolution ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS of Ohio,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at Marietta, in Ohio.

CHEROKEE EMIGRATION.

On motion of Mr. GRANTLAND,

On motion of Mr. GANT,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claims of the administrator of Joseph Edson, late marshal of the Vermont district, which have been suspended or disallowed by the Treasury Department.

REPEAL OF THE FIVE DOLLAR RESTRICTION.

Mr. KILGORE asked leave to submit the following, but it was objected to:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the operation of so much of the act of June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public moneys," as prohibits the receipt of the notes or bills of specie paying banks, which have issued, since the 4th July, 1836, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars, be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

And be it further resolved, That the operation of the second section of the act of April 14, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensions of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that he was sure there was a general desire on the part of the House that they should go on with this bill; and therefore he asked the House now to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. SERGEANT said, before this question was propounded to the House, he wished to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means when he proposed to call up the bill to establish what was termed a Sub-Treasury, or Independent Treasury?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, that, with the approbation of the House, he hoped to reach it some time next week. The great anxiety felt to act on the pre-emption bill was such, that he would not interpose any obstacle to it; but the moment that measure was disposed of, he should call up the Independent Treasury bill.

The House, agreeing to Mr. CAMBRELENG's motion, accordingly took up the "bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for 1837."

The bill had been reported from the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, with the following amendments:

1. This amendment was proposed by Mr. BELL, and therein agreed to:

"Add to the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That, if the President shall ascertain that all discontent and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five can be allayed or avoided, by allowing an additional compensation for the lands ceded to the United States by said treaty, and that the Government may thereby be saved the expense of keeping on foot the large military force in the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions to the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

This amendment was excepted to by Mr. CAMBRELENG, who moved a concurrence in the following, in lieu thereof, which Mr. BELL had been instructed to move by the Committee on Indian Affairs:

"SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full, for all the objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal West: Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided, further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appropriation unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the President shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the Government.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That, for satisfying all claims for arrearages of annuities, for supplying blankets and other articles of clothing for the Cherokees who are not able to supplying themselves and which may be necessary for their comfortable removal, and for medicines and medical assistance, and for such other purposes as the President shall deem proper to facilitate the removal of the Cherokees, one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. WISE resumed, and concluded his remarks; and the debate was continued by Messrs GRAHAM, BIDDLE, and LEGARE.

Mr. LEGARE having concluded his remarks, he was followed by Mr. DOWNING, both in support of the bill, when

Mr. CUSHMAN obtained the floor, and remarking that, though there was one amendment he felt very strongly inclined to vote in favor of, that was the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, but seeing no probability of bringing this debate to a close without applying that useful rule of the House, the previous question, he therefore demanded it, and hoped the House would sustain the motion.

Mr. MARTIN moved a call of the House, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. EVERETT called for the reading of the original bill, and the amendment made thereto in Committee of the Whole; which was ordered.

The House refused to second the call for the previous question—ayes 62, noes not counted.

Mr. BIDDLE rose amid the most vociferous calls for question from all parts of the Hall, and made a brief rejoinder to Mr. DOWNING.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee then made a brief defence of the Tennessee volunteers, from some charge of misconduct alleged to have been brought against them by General Jesup, though he admitted the possibility of Gen. Armstrong declining for them the labor of common laborers, though they never disobeyed an order of any kind from Gen. Jesup.

Mr. DOWNING made a brief reply to Mr. BIDDLE, and that gentleman again rejoined with much warmth, when the several amendments proposed to the body of the bill were all agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina called for the yeas and nays, on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. BELL, as printed in last evening's paper; which were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana inquired of the mover of the amendment if the two millions proposed in it were an additional sum to the means provided for in the bill, or were to be taken out of them.

Mr. BELL explained that his object was to take the two millions out of the means reported by the Committee of Ways and Means for the support of an army of six thousand men in the Cherokee country.

The question was then taken on this amendment; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 90, nays 112.

So the amendment was rejected; and the question recurring upon concurring in the amendment originally reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, thereon—

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKAY called for a division of the question, and it being taken on the first branch of the proposition, [the whole of this amendment was also printed in last evening's Globe,] the result was—yeas 189, nays 15.

So the first branch of the amendment was concurred in.

The question then recurring upon the second branch of the amendment—

Mr. McKAY explained that he had called for a division of the question for the reason, that though he was perfectly willing to vote an appropriation conformable to the recommendation of the Secretary of War, he was unwilling to vote so large a sum to pay these Indian claims. Mr. McK. understood they had all been examined into and long since rejected by Congress; but even if they were allowed, they would not exceed about $35,000, though he honestly believed nothing at all was due. In regard to blankets, medicines, etc. they could easily be purchased out of the $1,040,000, and appropriated in the first branch of the amendment. The truth was, he believed the real object of this item was to place the $100,000 in the hands of the Executive as secret service money, to buy up the Cherokee delegation in this city who were hostile to the treaty.

Mr. THOMPSON would suggest to the gentleman, as a suitable mode of carrying out of this system of economy, to specify the medicines, and to prescribe that they should consist of nothing but lobelia, as that drug was cheaper than calomel! The gentleman would not trust a sum of $100,000 to the discretion of the President, but Mr. T. would have thought better of it, if the gentleman upon a former occasion had not voted to trust the then Executive with the discretion of a three millions appropriation.

Mr. EVERETT stated that he had advocated this appropriation in committee, in order to facilitate the removal, and that no objection should be made that there was a want of articles necessary in effecting it. He had not advocated it for the purposes intimated by the gentleman from North Carolina; nor did he wish the House to vote for it on such ground. If the appropriation was not for necessaries for the Indians, he hoped it would be rejected. If it was for necessaries, he hoped it would be made by the House.

The second branch of the amendment was then concurred in—yeas 174, nays 20.

Mr. EVERETT then moved further to amend by adding a clause of $10,000 for making treaties with the Indian tribes.

Mr. HOPKINS then demanded the previous question; which was seconded, 84 to 61.

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, but they were refused, and the question was ordered without a division.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina, then called for the yeas and nays on the main question, being the engrossment of the bill, but they were refused, and the question prevailed without a division, and the bill ordered to a third reading and put on its passage, on which

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were 143 to 37.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CHAPMAN, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Rowe, in the State of Georgia, through Van's Valley, to Hollaway's, on Willis Creek, in Alabama.

On motion, at a quarter past 7 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 4, 1838.

GENTLEMEN: In your report in the Globe this morning of some remarks made by me on Saturday last, in reply to Mr. Cambreleng, it is said: "Mr. Reed disclaimed any acquaintance with John Ross." The Reporter was mistaken: Mr. Cambreleng called John Ross the gentleman's friend—meaning Mr. Reed. Mr. Reed, in reply, observed that he had not named John Ross in the debate, and that the remark of Mr. C. was gratuitous and improper, but did not say he did not know Mr. Ross. I do know John Ross. I have long known him, and I respect him as a man of extraordinary talents and firmness, and I esteem him as a man of honesty and moral worth.

Will you have the goodness to insert the above note in your paper, as an act of justice to myself and to Ross?

Your obedient servant,

JOHN REED.

Messrs. BLAIR and RIVES.

NOTE.—The Reporter, in justice to himself, would add that he distinctly heard Mr. REED say that the remark of Mr. CAMBRELENG was gratuitous and improper; and he repeats that, from the indistinctness of Mr. REED's manner of speaking, united with great noise and confusion in the hall, he did not hear Mr. REED say that he had long known and respected John Ross, and he therefore fell into an error in the slight abstract of the discussion. Had the Reporter given some of the remarks, especially the remarks of Mr. CAMBRELENG, to which Mr. REED replied more in full, he would probably have been more accurate than is ever intended in a mere sketch.

C. H. L.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, June 5, 1838.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

This being one of the days set apart for the consideration of bills relating to the Territories,

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio suggested that the committees be called on for reports this morning.

Mr. YELL said he must object to it, much as he disliked to do so, for these were the only two days the Territories would have, and he thought no other business should interpose.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in the opening of a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with Rock river.

Also, without amendment, Senate bill concerning a Seminary of learning in the Territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. BRONSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and establish the Territorial Government of Iowa.

Mr. B. also reported, without amendment, Senate bill to reorganize the Legislative Council of Florida, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARLAN made an inquiry of the CHAIR, in reference to the construction of the order, as to whether it set apart all the two days for Territorial business.

The CHAIR cited the order, which was general in its terms.

Mr. BOULDIN asked the consent of the House to indulge him with leave to offer a resolution setting apart Tuesday, the 12th of this month for the consideration of all such matters of business as relate to the District of Columbia, and which may be then pending before the House. Leave being granted unanimously—

Mr. YELL had no objection to the resolution, but preferred a more distant day than that named, or some other than a public day; however, he would suggest Monday the 11th.

Mr. BOULDIN would accept any day.

Mr. ADAMS objected to precluding petitions.

Mr. BOULDIN. Very well, then; make it after the morning hour.

Thus modified, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, all the Territorial bills in Committee of the Whole were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that they might be considered in one committee.

Pursuant to the order, the House then resolved itself into Committee on the Union, Mr. SERGEANT in the chair, and considered the following bills:

1. A bill to establish two additional land offices in that part of Wisconsin west of the Mississippi, which was laid aside, and the bill from the Senate on the same subject was taken up in its stead; and after being read, was laid aside, to be reported.

2. The Senate bill to create the office of Surveyor General in the Wisconsin Territory, was next considered, with certain amendments, proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill was briefly opposed by Mr. BOND, and was supported by Mr. JONES of Wisconsin, Mr. CASEY, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, and Mr. POPE.

After which, the amendments reported by the committee were severally adopted.

Mr. BRIGGS offered an amendment, to insert the words "State of Illinois" in several places, so that one office should answer for that State and the Territory of Wisconsin also.

Mr. BRONSON, Mr. LINCOLN, and Mr. MERCER opposed the amendment; and after some explanation from Mr. BRIGGS, he withdrew it.

Mr. BOND then moved an amendment, to reduce the salary proposed in the bill from two thousand to twelve hundred dollars; which was discussed, and modified to insert fifteen hundred, and adopted by a vote of ayes 80, noes not counted.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to amend so as to strike out the contingent provision of twenty-five hundred dollars, and to insert for one draughtsman and clerk a salary of one thousand dollars each.

Mr. BOND moved to amend the amendment, by making it read seven hundred dollars each, which was modified to read an aggregate compensation of sixteen hundred dollars; and having been accepted by Mr. CUSHMAN, the amendment as amended was adopted without a division.

Mr. CUSHMAN then moved to strike out the proposed appropriation for house rent and fuel, three hundred and fifty dollars; which was rejected—ayes 25, noes not counted.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

3. The bill to establish a new judicial district in the Territory of Florida, was next considered, and laid aside to be reported.

4. The bill from the Senate to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed and ascertained, the boundary line between the State of Missouri and Territory of Wisconsin, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a bill with provisions to the same end as the Senate bill; which amendment was adopted, and laid aside to be reported.

5. The bill from the Senate to ascertain and designate the boundary line between the State of Michigan and the Territory of Wisconsin, was taken into consideration, and laid aside to be reported.

7. The bill to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and establish the Territorial Government of Iowa.

The bill having been read through,

Mr. MASON of Ohio moved to strike out the enacting clause, stating in a few remarks, that he did not intend to commit himself against the bill, but it had been asserted that people had settled there in a manner contrary to law, and in regard to that and other topics he wished to obtain information.

Mr. CRARY advocated the passage of the bill, saying that there were a great many inhabitants who were virtually without the protection of law, and over whom the United States were bound to extend the protection of Government and law. He said Territorial Governments had been provided in former years over sections of less extent, and containing a much smaller number of people; and he could see no reason why this case should be excepted from the general policy.

Mr. MERCER made some remarks in opposition to the bill, and recommended that the bill should be passed over for a time, as it would cause debate, and would postpone or prevent the action of the committee upon other bills which would pass without debate, and which were important.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON opposed the bill and the creation of a Territorial Government in the Northwest; and went at length into a consideration of the balance of power between the Northern and Western, and the Southern States, as far as related to the questions of slavery, and the annexation of Texas. He said he would never consent to the coming in of these Territories or States into the Union, when the fanatical spirit of the North, was pouring into the House memorials against the annexation of Texas, simply because it was cursed with the peculiar institution of the South.

Mr. BRONSON offered some suggestions in support of the bill; and referred to a large number of actual settlers, who had acquired pre-emption rights, and would become citizens so soon as the lands should be surveyed and opened for sale. The committee had already passed upon two bills establishing land offices in that Territory, and so soon as they were prepared to act, there was a large tract which would be immediately settled and paid for. But he would not agree to the principle, that people should not be protected by Government, on the ground that they had not bought and paid for Government lands, when they had settled upon them, and had acquired pre-emption rights. He also alluded to the vast extent of the Territory of Wisconsin; and argued that as the whole was in the course of settlement, it would soon be necessary to establish the Government now proposed. He expressed his pleasure at the candor with which Mr. THOMPSON had stated the grounds of objection which he and some others might have to the bill.

Mr. B. said he would not go into a discussion of the main point of that objection, but he would refer to the ordinance respecting the Northwestern Territory to show that the United States were bound to provide such Governments for Territories, and to admit new States when certain contingencies arose, such as were described in that ordinance. He would not discuss the question of the admission of Texas, but gentlemen would see one strong point of difference. This Territory was owned now by the United States. It was theirs, and they were bound to protect it. Texas, on the contrary, was not ours, and would have to be acquired. He trusted the friends of the bill would not go into a discussion of the questions raised by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] which, if entered upon, would lead to an interminable debate.

Mr. POPE followed with some arguments in favor of the bill. He went into a defence of the settlers on these new lands, and spoke favorably of their general character, and justified the practice of squatting upon the lands, as in conformity with the intention of the law, which was only made to prohibit speculators from appropriating large tracts, without actual settlement. He also advocated the policy of erecting Territorial Governments, with salutary laws and proper officers to administer them. He spoke of the number of people on this Territory, and said he understood they were more numerous than the people of Arkansas when a Territorial Government was established there; the population then being only about six thousand.

Mr. BRONSON said there were now, as he was informed, on this Territory, west of the Mississippi, thirty thousand people, and they were constantly increasing.

Mr. THOMPSON replied to the argument founded upon the ordinance of 1787, and intimated that he wished to meet the question of admitting new States now, instead of waiting until it became a Territory with a hundred thousand people, and knocked at the door for admission as a State. He wished to preserve a balance of power; and the South desired the admission of Texas, that they might have in the Senate a protecting power for their institutions.

The debate was continued by Messrs. BRONSON, MERCER, EVERETT, JONES of Wisconsin, SHEPARD, and WHITE of Kentucky.

The motion to strike out the enacting clause was then rejected without a division.

Mr. BOND moved to amend the bill so as to strike out two thousand dollars as salary for the Governor, and fifteen hundred dollars as salary for the same person as Superintendent of Indian Affairs; and to insert twenty-five hundred dollars for his salary in both these capacities.

Mr. BRONSON remarked that the salary as fixed by the bill, was taken from other Territorial acts, and was less than the salary in some of the Territories. He said there were Indians to be removed from this Territory, and a great labor and responsibility would be required from the Governor in that service.

Mr. BOND spoke of his desire to reduce these salaries generally; and thought the more this Territory was subdivided, the more the salaries should be reduced, as the labor and care would be less. He, also, compared this proposed salary with that of the Governors in some of the States, and contended that these were put too high in comparison.

Mr. EVERETT wished to have the salary for each branch of the service designated, so that, in case different individuals should be employed, the proportions might be fixed for each.

Mr. BOND modified his motion according to this suggestion, so as to appropriate fifteen hundred dollars as salary for Governor, and one thousand as salary for Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

Mr. POPE offered a few remarks; after which the amendment was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside to be reported.

The bill from the Senate granting land to the Territory of Wisconsin, to open a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan and Rock river, was then taken up, with an amendment proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LINCOLN stated the general principle, that it is expedient for Governments, not only of the United States, but of the separate States, to afford facilities to corporations to carry on public works, which will result in general benefit to the community; and he was in favor of such action on the part of the Government. He said, however, that this bill on its face appeared to give lands to the Territory of Wisconsin; but such was not the fact. The land was given to a private corporation, (the Rock River Canal Company,) to remain private property.

Mr. BRONSON explained, that the Territorial Government desired to make the improvement, but doubted the authority of such a form of Government to do so, and had therefore incorporated a company to carry on the work; and in the act of incorporation they were empowered to petition Congress for a grant; and such rights and limitations were reserved and made; that, in point of fact, the grant would vest in the State, and not in individuals. He read from the act referred to, in order to show that, if any grant was made by the United States, it should become the property of the future State of Wisconsin, as soon as it should be admitted into the Union. He spoke of the great importance of the work, and hoped that all objection to it would be withdrawn, as it was a similar case to others that had existed in other Territories.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired if any estimate had been made of the value of the grant.

Mr. BRONSON said he did not know.

Mr. MERCER said he had made a calculation of the number of square miles; but his statement could not be heard by the Reporter.

Mr. LINCOLN thought the committee ought to wait till such information could be obtained. He understood the land was worth about three millions of dollars, and he wished to know the estimated cost of the canal, and whether that was the most useful method of improvement; and he illustrated the necessity of such knowledge by referring to a canal proposed from Boston to Albany, for which he and others had been once very zealous, though it had since been found that railroads were a better mode of transportation, and in that case in Massachusetts a railroad was now in the process of construction. Other topics, respecting the powers of the corporation, the rights of the State, and the propriety of taking tolls, and in opposition to immediate action upon the bill. With proper restrictions and safe-guards to the public rights, he should not object to the grant. He had another objection to the grant, because it was contemplated to keep the lands out of the market for ten years, and he feared that it would operate as an act of injustice and oppression towards the people.

Mr. PETRIKIN suggested a doubt whether there was any probability that the canal would ever be completed. There was no assurance that it ever would be completed. They would get the lands, and might never complete the work.

Mr. DROMGOOLE suggested that time ought to be given to examine this subject; and proposed that it should be laid over till to-morrow, that the committee might go on with other business, and members in the mean time could look into the merits of this bill.

Mr. BRONSON and Mr. CASEY assented, and the bill was passed over.

8. The bill granting an appropriation for purchasing a law library, for the use of the Committee of Appeals, and Legislative Council, of Florida, was taken up, and ordered to be reported.

9. The bill making an agpropriation for the compilation of the laws of Florida, was taken up, and ordered to be reported:

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, the committee then rose, and reported all the above bills to the House, except the one numbered 7.

The amendments to the several bills, as above reported, were severally concurred in by the House, with the exception of the one numbered 6, and they were read a third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to lay the bill numbered 6, on the table.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill, with an amendment, making appropriations for certain roads in Florida; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the amendment was ordered to be printed.

The following message from the President of the United States, was presented by the SPEAKER, and was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, relating to the claim of the orphan children of Peter Shackerly, in answer to their resolution of the 28th ultimo.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, 4th June, 1838.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 5, 1838.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of sundry citizens of Hudson, New York, praying for the establishment of a National Bank: laid on the table.

Mr. TALLMADGE also presented the petition of sundry citizens of ———, New York, praying for the establishment of a national foundry.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of Cornelius Halley of Ohio, praying remuneration for services performed during the late war: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, deceased, reported the same without amendment, stating that the committee were divided in their opinions as to the propriety of passing this bill, part of them being for, and part against it; and that he being opposed to it, should move its indefinite postponement when it came up.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the message of the President of the United States of 21st May last, on the subject of the Cherokee treaty, made a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed. [The committee came to the conclusion that it would be impolitic for the Government to encourage the belief on the part of the Cherokees that any extension of the time fixed upon for their removal by the treaty ought to be made by the Government, or would be agreed to by the States interested; and that their speedy removal was the only sure mode of avoiding collisions between them and the whites, and preserving the peace of the country.]

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY,

Ordered, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of authorizing the employment of an additional number of clerks in the General Post Office.

Mr. DAVIS submitted a resolution, which was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement of the annual expenditures for the collection of the revenue derived from imports and customs for the last twenty years.

Mr. YOUNG gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Ephraim Sprague.

Mr. MORRIS submitted the following resolution; which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That, with the consent of the House of Representatives, the Senate will, on Monday, the second day of July next, adjourn its present session until the second Monday in November following, and that, during such recess, no member or officer of the Senate shall be entitled to or receive any daily compensation.

Resolved further, That the consent of the House of Representatives to the adjournment of the Senate, according to the foregoing resolution, be requested.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed.

The bill to reorganize the District Courts of the United States for the district of Missouri.

The bill to authorize the location of pre-emption certificates, given by the Register of the Land Office at Batesville, Arkansas; and

The joint resolution for the distribution of certain copies of Niles's Register.

Mr. LYON moved to take up Senate bill 309, "making appropriations for the completion of certain roads in the State of Michigan." As this was a bill in which the State was deeply interested, he hoped the Senate would indulge him in his wishes. To obviate as far as possible all difficulty in relation to this subject, and reconcile conflicting views, he had prepared an amendment, which he begged leave to offer as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. SOUTHARD wanted to know on what ground these appropriations were asked, and from what fund the Senator proposed to make them.

Mr. LYON explained at length the object of the bill, which was to obtain 5 per cent. of all the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands which were sold, between the time of that State having applied for admission and her adoption into the Union. Mr. L. said he had a statement from the General Land Office, which would make the amount about equal to two hundred and fifty or two hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars. It was well known to all that Michigan had made application, and was ready to become a State long before she was admitted, having been kept back in consequence of the question of the Ohio boundary, and was thus deprived of her political rights. All she asked now was the 5 per cent. to which she was entitled, to finish the road which had been commenced when she was a Territory. This appeared to him just, and certainly was no more than the State was equitably entitled to.

Mr. SEVIER expressed a willingness to vote for the bill, having every disposition to promote in that way the improvements of the new States; but would suggest to his friend from Michigan [Mr. LYON] to so frame his amendment, as to let it read from the formation of the Constitution of that State in 1835.

Mr. LYON said she had applied for admission at an earlier period; but he would rather date from that time than have nothing; whenever the interests of his State were concerned, he was thankful even for small favors.

Mr. NORVELL then suggested, with a view to meet the wishes of the Senator from Arkansas, who had so generously proffered his support, that the mover so modify his amendment as to read from the 23d of June, 1835. This modification having been adopted by Mr. LYON, the question was taken on the amendment, as modified, and carried; which reads as follows:

"That five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within the State of Michigan, which were sold under the authority of Congress between the 23d day June, 1835, and the 1st day of July, 1836, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the completion of such and so many of the roads commenced by the United States in the Territory of Michigan, with such alterations of said roads as the Legislature of said State may direct: Provided, That not more than one-fourth part of said five per cent. shall be drawn from the Treasury during the present year."

On the question of engrossment, Mr. DAVIS asked for the yeas and nays; when there appeared for it 22, against it 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, Webster, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clayton, Davis, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, and White—21.

The bill from the House making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837, was read twice, and referred.

The following bills were severally taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and disposed of as specified below:

The bill authorizing certain soldiers in the late war with Great Britain to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof: indefinitely postponed.

The bill to repeal so much of the act approved the 2d July, 1836, and all other laws, as authorizes the Postmaster General to establish an Express mail in addition to the ordinary mail: laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of Pierre Menard and others: postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, to-morrow week.

The bill to confirm certain entries of public lands permitted to be made by the registers and receivers of the land districts, under the belief that the tract had been offered at public sale: amended, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of William Crooks and James Crooks: laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of John P. Converse and Henry J. Reese: rejected.

The bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Colonel Albert Pawling, deceased: laid on the table.

The bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING saw no necessity for the passage of the bill. He would remind the Senator who introduced it, that a bill had already passed the Senate, in relation to the same subject, which was general in its provisions, and embraced the State of Illinois. He thought it inexpedient to encumber legislation by passing two bills of the same import, and would suggest that it be laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG thought the Senator from Alabama was mistaken. He was aware of the bill mentioned by the Senator; that applied only to railroads; but this was not a railroad.

[Mr. KING here said the Senator would find it general. He would see, by referring to it, that it applied to McAdamized roads.]

Mr. Y. answered, it was not even a McAdamized road, but one which the State had commenced, which was called the great Western mail route, and was one on which the United States mails were carried to a great extent, and was the means of the Post Office Department making more favorable contracts than it could otherwise have done. It was on this ground that the State asked something for the purpose of aiding in carrying this road into full operation; and that was done in such manner that it would have lost Government nothing. All that was asked was the right of way, and use of materials, for completing a road which was not embraced in the general act. Mr. Y. here went into a statement, showing the numerous roads that had been commenced in his State, and were in a state of forwardness, which he maintained would give an enhanced value to the public domain, far greater in fact than would be received by the State of Illinois by the small grant of what was asked for.

Mr. KING said he was in hopes that the Senator would not have pushed this motion. The bill already passed embraced all, and if it did not, it could be amended in the House of Representatives. This road might be an exception, and probably it ought to be provided for; but an objection he had to the bill was that it proposed to take off all the timber on the land subject to private entry, to the loss or injury of the purchaser. He was not prepared to take away the materials for the purpose of giving them to a corporation. When the lands were public, it might do, but not when they were private property; he thought it altogether objectionable.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to postpone the bill indefinitely. He thought the one already passed was sufficiently liberal; so much so, indeed, that although not unfriendly to the object, it struck him as too much so in its nature. Besides, he was not disposed to grant favors to one State that he did not to others. He presumed that when Illinois made the road, it was not for the purpose of benefitting the Government in carrying the mail, but for the aggrandizement and improvement of her own resources. Such an argument as that used by the Senator from Illinois might be used by every other State for the purpose of obtaining appropriations.

Mr. YOUNG replied somewhat at length, maintaining that the value of the public lands was greatly improved by these roads, and that thousands upon thousands of the waste lands would thereby be brought into market.

The question being taken on the indefinite postponement, it was carried in the affirmative.

The bill granting a township of land to the French University of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, was taken up.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama thought this bill ought to be postponed. There were many objections to the measure in a constitutional point of view that would present themselves to the minds of gentlemen, which he was not disposed to take up the time of the Senate by going into.

Mr. BENTON advocated the school with much zeal, maintaining that it was the only school in the Union where the living languages were taught so as to be practically useful. Mr. B. thought the donation was due to that French institution, and said that he saw no constitutional difficulties in the way.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he could not understand how we were to grant a whole township of land to a French institution, because the languages were taught there. He presumed the languages were as well taught, and probably better, in all the other universities of the country. He thought the whole matter should be well considered before final action was taken on it; and, in his opinion, it would be infinitely better to postpone the bill.

Mr. KING made a statement in relation to the lands received by different States for the purposes of education. Though the grants were the same, the value, in many instances, varied materially. For instance, that of Alabama had been found amply sufficient. In some of the States, the lands sold higher than others, because the soil was more appreciated. That, he presumed, was the fact in relation to Alabama, though her school land was disposed of at a fortunate period. Mr. K. was opposed to making any special grant. If it were extended to Missouri, he hoped it would be to every other State.

Mr. BENTON went into a history of this institution, claiming for it a great superiority over all the schools in the country for the French and Spanish languages. At this school there were young gentlemen from every part of the world, in the constant use of their mother tongue, French, Spanish, Italian, and others, and under such circumstances only could those languages be properly acquired. If there were schools or colleges in this country where the languages were as well taught, he did not know them. Of the many gentlemen that had learned thei anguages in these universities, he had never yet known one that had learned them so as to make them of practical utility; that was, to speak them fluently in conversation, and if they were enabled to do so, they must have acquired them somewhere else. Mr. B. felt sorry that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] had made so strenuous an opposition to a measure which was so reasonable in itself.

Mr. SEVIER expressed his willingness to vote for the bill. In the first place, the object was laudable; and in the second, he thought the lands ought to be at the disposal of States wherein they lie. Mr. S. dwelt for some time on this subject, maintaining that now the public debt was paid, such ought to be the disposition of the public domain. The lands were acquired by the common blood and treasure of our ancestors, which the old States held on to, while those of the new were sold for the common benefit of the whole. When it was proposed to give any thing in the way of grant to the new States, we were immediately told of the inequality of stich a proceeding. He would vote for no grants to the old States, and was for putting the matter on an equality by holding on to the lands in the new. Here we were spending millions to get rid of Indians in Georgia; and were the lands thus acquired sold for the common benefit? Mr. S. hoped that the bill would be permitted to pass.

Mr. CLAY having asked the yeas and nays on the indefinite postponement, they were ordered, and there appear for it 25, against it 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Wall, White, and Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Fulton, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Webster, and Young—14.

At about half past four o'clock the Senate went into Executive session, and then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, June 6, 1838.

At the suggestion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, the committees were called on for reports.

Mr. W. from the Committe of Claims, reported the following resolution, which, after some explanatory remarks from Mr. W. was concurred in:

Mr. FAIRFIELD gave notice that, on Friday next, he should move the House to take up the bill in relation to the Northeastern boundary.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to establish a port of entry at Indian Key, Florida.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a joint resolution dissenting from, disapproving, and disaffirming, an act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Wisconsin chartering a bank at Prairie du Chien; and the resolution was passed nem. diss.

The House then resumed the special order, being the consideration of bills on the Territories.

The bill to create the office of Surveyor General of Public Lands in the Territory of Wisconsin.

The bill to authorize the southern boundary line of Wisconsin to be ascertained and marked.

The two foregoing bills were read the third time and passed.

The House then took up the bill to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and to establish the Territorial Government of Iowa, reported from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments.

The pending one was on reducing the proposed salary of the Governor from two thousand to fifteen hundred dollars, and the salary of Superintendent of Indian Affairs from fifteen hundred to one thousand dollars.

Mr. SHIELDS made some remarks in favor of erecting a Territorial Government in Iowa, as in accordance with safe precedents, and necessary for the welfare of the people.

Mr. DOWNING moved the previous question; which motion was rejected—ayes 54, noes 70.

Mr. BOND called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment, and they were ordered by a vote of, ayes 31, noes 95.

The amendment was then opposed by Mr. ADAMS, and supported by Mr. BOND, who contended that the salary proposed by him was adequate compensation for the service required.

Mr. MERCER made some observations on the general character of the bill, and the extent of the country, and in opposition to the bill.

Mr. ADAMS followed in a review of the charges made of extravagance that had always been made against every Administration that had existed, and the constant cry of retrenchment and reform. He would always join in that cry, and when he could find extravagance, he would endeavor to put it down. But when the complaint was merely against the salary of a Territorial Governor, whose jurisdiction extended over a great section of country, and the effort was to save a thousand dollars, it was not such retrenchment as he was in favor of. He did not think the salary proposed in the bill was too large. He then went into some statements to show the vast extent of the country included in the proposed Territory of Iowa, and contending that it was much greater than had been represented by Mr. MERCER.

Mr. A. then went into an examination of the obligations of the Government to create Governments, as may be necessary, and to erect and receive States into the Union, in the Northwestern Territory; and replied to the remarks of Mr. THOMPSON, that he would not vote for any new States in the Northwest because it was refused to admit Texas into the Union. He was opposed to that argument in favor of violating the solemn obligations of the Government, and appealed to the Constitution and the law in support of the position he had taken. As he was going into some remarks upon the subject of slavery,

The SPEAKER said his remarks were not in order.

Mr. ADAMS said the gentleman from South Carolina had been allowed to expatiate upon that subject without being called to order; and he was again called to order.

Mr. THOMPSON begged that Mr. ADAMS might be allowed to go on, urging that he was discussing the expediency of admitting a slave State into the Union, and that was strictly in order.

Mr. ADAMS resumed, and continued a few remarks upon the subject of slavery, when he was again called to order, and having concluded his remarks, he took his seat.

Mr. BRONSON called the attention of the House to the question immediately pending; and referring to the amendment proposed by Mr. BOND, he said that was in accordance with the salary of the Governor of Wisconsin, as now established, and as had intended by the committee, who, in drafting this bill, had been led into an error, by taking the House bill for Wisconsin as the model for this, forgetting that the salaries had afterwards been reduced in the Senate.

Mr. BOND referred to the remarks of Mr. ADAMS upon the general charges of extravagant expenditure; and alleging that the Administration party, having the majority in both Houses of Congress, were responsible for the extravagant expenditures of the Administration; and the Government was not to be absolved from responsibility by throwing it upon the Houses of Congress.

Mr. HARLAN, in support of the amendment, referred to the salaries of the Governors of many of the States, which, while involving a much greater amount of responsibility, the duties were far less than that proposed for the Governor of Iowa.

Mr. MERCER made some further comments on the extent of the Territory.

Mr. JONES of Wisconsin, said he would assent to the amendment of Mr. BOND, and hoped the House would take a vote upon it at once.

Mr. THOMPSON, after some remarks in reference to his former observations, and partly in reply to Mr. ADAMS, was called to order, when he moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The SPEAKER said the motion to amend had precedence.

Mr. BYNUM said that he rose merely to reply briefly to the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. BOND.] That gentleman, with an air of triumph, asked why the members of the Administration did not come out and defend it against the charges of extravagance, that he had made against it?

Sir, said Mr. B. the honorable member certainly has presumed greatly upon the ignorance of the public, and particularly on that of his constituents, when he is making these most reckless and unfounded statements. The gentleman has not specified any particular act of the Executive as being extravagant, but takes shelter under general charges; and, sir, has, in the zeal of partisan heat, overleaped every thing like a correct statement of facts.

Sir, he with an air, told us that this Administration came into power upon the charge of Executive extravagance, and on its pledge to reform it. Now, sir, the gentleman must know that his first statement is entirely unfounded in fact; that under such circumstances, there could have been no principle involved. The petty extravagance of no Executive would be sufficient to found a party upon. No, no, sir; the gentleman must know that this Administration, as well as the preceding one, came into power upon higher and nobler principles, which the gentleman seems purposely determined not to tell the people of this country or his constituents. Little could have been effected by the petty reform in any department, by the scaling down of salaries, &c.

No, sir, no friend of the Administration ever thought of coming into power under such circumstances; nor did their opponents. The great measures upon which the Republican party came into power were founded on principle; and that principle was in their opposition to a most prodigal and impracticable system of internal improvements, then about being carried on in this country, by which millions and millions of the people's money would have been squandered.

Sir, at that time, from a statistical statement, made out by Judge Smith, then a distinguished Senator from South Carolina, there were projects in contemplation, about being submitted to the sanction of Congress, of internal improvement, to the amount of eight hundred millions of dollars, which, if carried into effect, would have impoverished this whole nation. Sir, this extravagance it was, that the Democracy rallied with a determination to reform. Sir, little did they then think of your Executive reform, farther than he gave countenance to this prodigal system; to have done so, would have been a mere picayune business.

Secondly, he said, there was another great principle upon which the present party came into power. It was founded in their opposition to your odious, unequal, and unjust tariffs, which were extracting millions and tens of millions yearly from the pockets of the people, to be scrambled for by log-rolling politicians in this House, and to be voted away to the more favored States and objects. It was their opposition to the tariff that caused the Democracy of the North, South, East, and West, to rally against the former Administration, of which the honorable member from Massachusetts was at the head. Yes, sir, this was the reform that the Democracy went for, and this they got, and the country has realized the beneficial effects of it.

And, sir, thirdly, let me tell the gentleman, that it was against an extravagant system of forts, fortifications, and light-houses, that the present party went in opposition to his party, under the lead of the member from Massachusetts.

The United States Bank also was one of the great subjects on which the two parties differed, and which brought one of them into power, and sustained them under the former and present Administration. Sir, it was against the extravagance of that institution, that aroused the freemen and Democrats throughout the country; but the gentleman does not feel very anxious that these truths should be known, however anxious he may be to put it forth on other subjects. Sir, the gentleman misstated every fact, in his zeal, no doubt, in relation to which this Administration came into power, and most adroitly endeavors to shift the true issue from great principles to mere petty and pitiful acts of individuals, which will and must necessarily occur under every Government from its very nature.

Sir, this gentleman had labored long and often to implicate the Executive into some act of extravagance or folly. Yet he had never brought forward any specific charge—any tangible proposition. It all seemed to be for effect abroad. If the gentleman would dare bring forward any proposition, he would go with great pleasure with him to correct any individual abuse. Why did not the gentleman do so, if he knew of so many abuses? Sir, he was doing himself and the country great injustice to conceal or blink these subjects, knowing them as well as he did, or pretended to know them.

Sir, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has correctly informed the gentleman from Ohio, that the Executive cannot be properly responsible for those acts of the Government, which he has denounced as extravagant. He cannot appropriate a single dollar, without the assent of this and the other body of this Congress. If, then, there is extravagance, it is here—here, in this House. Let the gentleman commence here, and see how many of his own party he will leave unconvicted. I dare him to do it. I dare him to attempt it. I challenge him to look to the journals of this House—see the yeas and nays upon every extravagant appropriation, and if a majority of his friends have not voted for every one of them. Yes, sir, I challenge the gentleman to do this.

Then, sir, how does it comport with candor and honesty, to be continually crying against the other party, for that which they themselves are most guilty of.

Sir, were I to be guilty of such a course, I should blush to meet my constituents, or to appear before an intelligent American public.

There was other causes of the increase of public expenditures, that he would remind his honorable friend of, for personally, he assured him, he considered him so, and was proud of it. It had in a great measure been owing to the immense issues of paper money, that had swelled out and given an additional and fictitious value to every thing consumed or employed by Government—with hundreds, if not thousands, of other most satisfactory causes to any impartial, rational mind. But this was no time to go into detail in relation to those matters, and it would be out of order to do so upon this subject. He hoped the gentleman would, however, bring in some proposition upon this subject; and as a friend of reduction and reform, he would pledge himself to go with him to his heart's content.

This, however, the gentleman seemed studiously to avoid. Perhaps it was because nearly every similar attempt of special committees had never failed to cover their authors with shame and contempt, and end in the disgrace of their party. He hoped that the gentleman would not be discouraged, however, but would bring forward his proposition for a scaling committee, as he would most assuredly lend to him his little aid in carrying it on.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired if there was no way to dispose of the bill so as to go on with other business; and he suggested a postponement till to-morrow, but withdrew it on suggestion.

Mr. BELL suggested the expediency of adopting the amendment at once, as he understood it was satisfactory to the friends of the bill; and he moved to reduce the salaries of the judges to fifteen hundred dollars; which was not in order.

After a few remarks from Mr. POPE and Mr. BOND,

Mr. THOMPSON moved to lay the bill on the table, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 42, nays 134.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

At the suggestion of Mr. BRONSON, Mr. BOND withdrew his call for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and, the question being taken, the amendment was adopted without a division.

Mr. SHEPARD then moved the motion offered by Mr. BELL, in relation to salaries of judges; which was adopted without a division.

Mr. MERCER moved so to amend the first section as to provide for the establishment of Iowa as a Territory when Wisconsin became a State.

Mr. BRONSON remarked that such an amendment was perfectly useless, as, on the admission of Wisconsin, the separation would take place as a matter of course.

Mr. MERCER. Then there was no necessity whatever for the passage of the bill at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. CLOWNEY called for the yeas and nays; which were refused.

Mr. CLOWNEY called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered.

Mr. EWING opposed the bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved the previous question; which, being seconded, was ordered to be then put, and the main question being on the passage of the bill, was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 51.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SERGEANT in the Chair.

The bill granting land to the Territory of Wisconsin, to open a canal and connect the waters of Lake Michigan and Rock river, which had been passed over in committee yesterday, was again taken up, and the question pending was on the amendment offered by Mr. PETRIKIN to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRONSON offered several amendments, which he thought would satisfy the gentlemen who had objected to the bill yesterday, as they went to alter the bill so as to vest the land in the State whenever it should be admitted into the Union, instead of vesting it in the Territory; and also to secure the appropriation to the construction of the canal, and to secure the completion thereof.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired what was the necessity of granting land now for the construction of a canal which had not been located?

Mr. MERCER submitted an amendment for consideration, going into details to secure the appropriation to the purpose intended, and to guard against waste and misuse of the grant.

After some few remarks by Messrs. POPE and BRONSON, the question was taken on the amendment proposed to the amendment by Mr. PETRIKIN, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurred upon the amendments offered by Mr. BRONSON.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana objected to those amendments, and was in favor of Mr. MERCER's, or something like it.

Mr. PETRIKIN said the object was not to make a canal, but it was entirely one of speculation; every movement proved it. If it was not a matter of speculation, why was the House called upon to legislate so long in anticipation? He said there were many companies now engaged in western land speculations, not only by purchasing lands, but by employing squatters, and taking whole townships; and that this had been done, he could not tell precisely, but somewhere in the neighborhood of this grant. He looked upon this as a mere speculation, and should vote against it in every shape.

Mr. MERCER explained the object of his amendment, and said he only wished to have it reported and printed by the House, so that members could examine it.

Mr. LINCOLN proposed some amendments, and suggested that it was impossible, without examination, to see whether they were congruous or not; and he hoped the several amendments offered by different gentlemen might be reported and printed, to be examined and made perfect, so as to meet the views of every one in the House, before a final question should be taken.

The course indicated by Mr. LINCOLN was adopted by the committee, and the bill and proposed amendments were laid aside to be printed.

2. The bill to re-organise the Legislative Council of Florida, was then taken up.

Mr. BRIGGS proposed a verbal amendment, which was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside to be reported.

3. The bill making appropriations to complete the public buildings in Wisconsin, was next considered.

After some brief discussion by Messrs. POPE, BOND, and PETRIKIN, the bill was laid aside to be reported.

4. The committee then took up and considered the bill making appropriations for the construction of certain roads in Florida, which was laid aside to be reported to the House.

5. The bill making appropriations for the construction of certain roads in Wisconsin was then taken up.

This was a Senate bill, and several amendments proposed by the Committee on Roads and Canals being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be reported.

6. The bill concerning a Seminary of learning in Wisconsin was then considered.

7. The bill to confirm an act passed by the Legislative Council of Florida, incorporating the Florida and Peninsular railroad company, was then considered, amended, and agreed to.

8. Mr. DOWNING made an earnest appeal to the committee to take up the bill to authorize the people of Florida to take a census, hold a convention, and form a Constitution, but

Mr. POTTS moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailing, the committee rose and reported.

The amendments to those amended being concurred in, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, were read a third time, and passed.

No. 1 was postponed till to-morrow.

The joint resolution introduced to day for the benefit of certain widows of Revolutionary officers, was read a third time, and passed.

The CHAIR laid before the House the following message in writing:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the 4th inst. calling for any communication received from the Governors of the States of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, or Alabama, in reference to the proposed modification of the Cherokee treaty of 1835, I herewith inclose a report of the Secretary of War, which is accompanied by a copy of a letter addressed to him by the Governor of Georgia, and of his reply. As stated by the Secretary, no communication on the subject has been received from either of the other Executives mentioned.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, June 6, 1838.

The message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. HAYNES, laid on the table.

Mr. MASON of Virginia, on leave, laid on the table an amendment he proposed to submit to the Independent Treasury bill, when that bill came up for consideration; and it was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRONSON moved that the House again go into committee on the Territorial business.

Mr. McKENNAN moved an extension of the special order for that business till to-morrow.

Mr. BRONSON and Mr. DOWNING both expressed a hope that that motion would prevail.

Mr. YELL said he should object to it.

Mr. MALLORY moved that the House adjourn; which motion prevailing,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, May 6, 1838.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the message from the President, received yesterday during the Executive session, relating to Indian affairs, was referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TROTTER presented a petition from certain citizens of the town of Rodney, in Mississippi, praying an act of Congress making that town a port of entry: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MOUTON presented a memorial from L tt and Ires, praying confirmation of certain grants of land in Louisiana: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill from the House of Representatives, making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages in 1837, without amendment. As this was a bill of general interest, he gave notice that he would call it up at the most convenient hour to consider it.

Mr. LINN, from the Select Committee to whom was referred the project of taking possession of the Territory of Oregon, made a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Jacob Marks, a private in the Marine Corps; which was concurred in.

Mr. W. from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of James H. Clarke; which was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill granting additional clerks to the Post Office and Auditor's office connected therewith: read, and ordered to a second reading.

rest, accompanied by a report, which was ordered to be printed. The bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. R. from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the mother of Andrew Watts, which was concurred in.

Mr. GRUNDY said that the bill for the relief of J. P. Converse and Henry J. Rees, had been rejected yesterday; and as he had voted for the rejection, he should now move to reconsider that vote. He was always disposed to do strict justice to the application of claimants. From a conversation he had held with the head of the Post Office Department since the rejection of the bill, he had derived certain information which he was not before possessed of in relation to that claim; and though he did not agree that the bill should be passed in its present shape, yet, if the Senate would indulge him in his wish to reconsider the vote, he would then move to recommit the bill to the committee that reported it, in order that the committee might have the benefit of the information he had derived, and do what was right and just between the Government and claimants.

Mr. MERRICK, who reported the bill, expressed a wish that the Senator might be gratified. He believed the claim to be essentially a just one, and had advocated it with some zeal, on account of the opinion he entertained of its merits.

The vote was taken on reconsideration, and carried in the affirmative; and the bill, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY, was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LYON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of such letters from Generals Scott and Brady and Major Garland, of the United States army, and a copy of such other evidence in possession of his Department as may tend to verify or refute certain charges against the Government of the United States, or the State of Michigan, made either direct or impliedly by Lieutenant Colonel Maitland, of the military forces of Upper Canada, in his published official report of the 25th of February last, relative to the dispersion of the forces assembled on Fighting island, in the Detroit river.

Mr. L. said he had not seen the official report of Colonel Maitland, to which this resolution referred, but he believed he had given its date and description with sufficient accuracy to identify it.

He understood that it had been extensively published in both the Canadas and in England, and that it contained statements bearing against the Government of the United States, or, at least, against the official authorities acting in Michigan, which were incorrect and untrue, and were entirely disproved and refuted by the correspondence and evidence called for in the resolution.

It was due to the gallant officers of the army, and to the Brady Guards, and other patriotic volunteers who sustained them on the Detroit frontier, and it was no less due to the character of the Government itself, that this refutation should be published as widely, if possible, as the original charges had been.

He would not leave the British Government, nor would he leave the Government or people of Canada, any excuse or justification whatever for such an act of piracy and murder as had been committed, under the sanction of some of the official authorities of that Government, in the destruction of the Caroline! He did not know that this atrocious act was approved by the British authorities at home, but he saw with great pain and regret that it seemed to be approved by the authorities of Canada. If he was not misinformed, the officer under whose direction the outrage was committed had been promoted, or honored in some other way for his services; and such was the public sentiment at Toronto, if we can believe the newspapers, that on some public occasion there lately, Capt. Marryatt, an officer of the British navy, and a writer of some distinction, gave as a toast: "Captain Drew and his brave companions who cut out the steamboat Caroline!"

He believed this statement might be relied on as correct, for on account of it the Captain had since that time been burnt in effigy in the city of Detroit, and all his writings with him, in front of the house where he was then staying; and it was not known that he had ever disavowed the sentiment.

Now, sir, said Mr. L. if such outrages are to pass not only without censure, but with positive and unqualified approbation, as in this instance, it is time for both this Government and the Government of Great Britain to look well to the consequences that may follow.

What do we see already? The newspapers of yesterday inform us that the British steamer Sir Robert Peel has been boarded, set fire to, and destroyed, by a body of armed men proceeding from our shores, while the boat was lying peaceably and quietly at anchor in our waters, on the river St. Lawrence! Is it not highly probable that this act has been committed in retaliation for the destruction of the Caroline, and on account of the approval of that act by the Canadian authorities? And if such be the fact, sir, would it not be as reasonable in us to approve this outrage as it was in them to approve that? But who is there in this nation, what public man or what private citizen is there, who will sanction the aggression? Not one, sir; none but reckless, lawless desperadoes, who, having neither character nor any thing else to lose themselves, would gladly plunge the nation into war, in the hope that something may turn up to their personal advantage.

I trust, sir, the offenders will be brought to justice; that they will be visited with the utmost rigor of the law; and that we shall set an example to our Canadian neighbors which it will be their interest, as well as their duty, to follow; for they may rest assured, that should a war once be kindled between the two countries, the result would be as little to their advantage as to our own, and it would unquestionably be one of the greatest and most deplorable calamities that could befall either.

Mr. PRESTON asked if the consideration of the resolution was sought for now? He did not know that he should be opposed to the measure, but it struck him as somewhat peculiar to ask for information in relation to so delicate a matter, from subordinate officers.

Mr. LYON said he felt no disposition to press it. The resolution might lie over in accordance with the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate a copy of any order or circular issued by him to the collectors and receivers of public money since the passage of the joint resolution of the 1st of June, 1838, relating to the public revenues and dues to the Government.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a "bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers." Mr. B. gave notice that as this was a bill of a public nature, and of some importance, he should call it up at an early day.

Mr. WHITE, agreeably to notice given, introduced a bill to regulate the modes of empanneling jurors in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YOUNG, in accordance with notice previously given, introduced a bill for the relief of Ephraim Sprague: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BENTON said that a communication which had been received from the Treasury Department in relation to the exchanges, &c. had been ordered to be printed, and the usual number had been struck off; but, as it was a document of some importance, going back as far as '83, several of his friends had suggested that an extra number had better be ordered, and, in accordance with that wish, so generally expressed, he would move that 3,000 copies be printed; which motion was concurred in.

The bill from the House establishing a new Judicial District in the Territory of Florida;

The bill making an appropriation for a compilation of the laws of Florida; and

The bill making an appropriation for the purchase of a Law Library for the benefit of the Legislative council and Court of Appeals of the same Territory; were severally read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate bill for creating an office of Surveyor General of the public lands in the Territory of Wisconsin, was read as amended by the House and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the bill as amended in the House to authorize the President to ascertain and mark the Southern boundary of the Territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. LINN laughingly observed, that bill appeared truly an unfortunate one. It had been introduced by him, on leave, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, from whence, he believed, his friend [Mr. GRUNDY] had reported it, with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause. Well, sir, said Mr. L. the bill was passed and sent to the House, where again it had been so amended as to strike out all after the enacting clause, and sent back to us. He did not know what better could be done with it than to refer it again to the kind care of his friend.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following reports from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims were read and, on motion, laid on the table for the present:

The rejection of the claim of James Caldwell;

The rejection of the petition of General Jacob Baley;

And the rejection of the petition of Jacob Bancroft.

Mr. PRENTISS moved to take up the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Lucy Bond and Hannah Douglass, which having been acquiesced in by the Senate, Mr. P. explained the merits of the bill; and after some discussion,

Mr. TIPTON said he should endeavor to get rid of this bill once more, by moving to lay it on the table. The bill would doubtless lead to a long and protracted discussion, and was in the way of other business more likely to be progressed in. The bill was laid on the table.

The bill to set apart a belt of land on the western borders of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, as bounty lands, to be granted to settlers engaged for a term of years in the defence of the frontier.

Mr. FULTON made a brief explanation of the merits of this bill, and moved that it be made the order of the day for Monday next, which was acquiesced in.

The bill to authorize the State of Mississippi to invest the two per cent. fund of that State was then taken up.

Mr. TROTTER said that bill had been reported by his worthy colleague, who, it was known, was absent from his Senatorial duties from severe indisposition; he had hoped that his colleague would have been so far recovered as to have been enabled to attend to this bill; but as such was not the case, and as he did not feel himself enabled to do justice to the measure on so short a notice, he would move that the bill be placed on the general orders, which was acquiesced in.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

The bill to confirm certain entries of public lands permitted to be made by the registers and receivers of the land districts, under the belief that the tract had been offered at public sale.

The bill making appropriation for the completion of certain roads in Michigan.

The following bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain pre-emption claims to land in Indiana.

The bill for the relief of certain settlers of the public lands who were deprived of the benefit of the act granting pre-emption rights, which was approved on the 19th June, 1834.

The bill for the relief of Robert Keyworth.

The bill to settle the construction of the act regulating the pay of the paymasters in the army.

Mr. BENTON thought he could explain the object of this bill more briefly, perhaps, than by reference to the papers, which merely showed the effect without giving the reasons which actuated the committee in reporting the bill. The act which had passed long since, regulating the pay and emoluments of a paymaster in the army, made them equal to a major in the army, but did not say what major, whether of cavalry or of infantry. Some of these officers had set up claims to the largest amount of pay, to wit: that of a major of cavalry. The affair, he believed, had in some instances been carried to the judiciary. In some courts the pay of the largest amount was allowed; in others, that of the major of infantry. The object of this bill was merely to settle the matter for the time to come, without having any retrospective bearing. This bill gave those officers the largest amount; it was made a beneficial act towards them. The labors and responsibilities of this class of Government agents were greatly increased, and many of them had been subject to very severe losses in payments made to militia and volunteers. The committee, under these considerations, thought it would be nothing more than reasonable to allow them the difference between those two officers—majors of cavalry and infantry; and though the sum was small, being only a few dollars, yet it w as something to them and comparatively nothing to the Government.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the benefit of the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad company, in the State of Indiana, was then taken up.

Mr. TIPTON explained this bill at length, showing the advantages to be derived by the Government in carrying the United States mail, transporting munitions of war, &c. and stating that some of the lands which were asked for by the bill had remained unsold for thirty years last past.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana went at length into the objects and provisions of the bill. He showed the great importance of the work, both in a National, State and individual point of view. He stated that the length of the contemplated road was about one hundred and twenty miles; that it was the important and indispensable link in the great chain of railroad from Charleston, South Carolina, passing through the States of South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, to intersect the Mississippi at Alton and St. Louis. He argued the vast interest the South, as well as the West, had in this grand chain of internal communication, connecting together these great and extensive sections of the Union. He spoke in high terms of the grandeur and importance of the design of the Charleston and Western railroad, and most heartily wished it success. He avowed himself the friend of internal improvements, and contended for the power of the General Government to execute works of a national character, leaving the States and private companies to construct those of a local character. He stated that the contemplated road would pass through a section of country in Indiana in which the desirable lands had long since been located; that those remaining were refuse lands that had been in market thirty and thirty-two years without finding a purchaser. He said he would not, on private speculation, give twenty-five cents per acre for these lands. They would not sell for that sum, he believed, although they were located in the older sections of the State. He urged the fact that they had not been sold in so great a length of time as conclusive evidence of their refuse character. He showed that the proposition in the bill, the condition of the grant, to carry the mail for twenty years without charge to the Government, on the road from New Albany to Mount Carmel, would pay one dollar and six cents for each acre granted, at the price it now cost the Government to convey the mail on a parallel road between these points. He said the bill only granted alternate lands, leaving the balance to be enhanced in value by the work. He urged the fallacy of the argument that had been used, that the price could not be raised by the works, as they must be sold at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. In answer to which he contended, that the value of money depended very much upon the time of its reception; and he illustrated by showing that if these lands had been sold at fifty cents per acre when they were first brought into market, the use of the money would have been worth more to the Government than the one dollar and twenty-five cents would be if sold now; and although the works may not raise the minimum price of these lands, they will cause them to sell, and add to the general wealth of the State, and to the revenues of the Government. He closed by saying he hoped the grant would be made, as he had no doubt but that it would prove greatly beneficial to the Government, as well as to the company and State.

Mr. NILES thought there were constitutional objections to the bill; besides, it looked like a bargain on the part of the Government with a private corporation, and he had always been, and always should be, opposed to all bargain, intrigue, and management; and he should either move to strike out all that portion of the bill which related to the grant of public lands, or to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. SOUTHARD would like to know if the Senator struck out all that related to the grant, what there would be left in the bill.

Mr. TIPTON said he had no objection to testing the sense of the Senate in relation to striking out. If that were done, some other features less objectionable to the scruples of Senators might be introduced. With regard to bargain, Mr. T. said it was matter of every day concern in the operations of the General Government. What were contracts for carrying the mail, building forts, &c. but bargains. He could see nothing unconstitutional in the bill; all it asked was to permit the company to purchase lands within a prescribed space of its road at the rate of one dollar and six cents an acre; that was the head and front of the bill; it asked that, and no more.

Mr. ALLEN avowed himself friendly to the object, and if the Senator [Mr. TIPTON] would so amend his bill as to give the land to the State, it should receive his vote; otherwise, he could not support it. He thought the bill established a bad precedent—that of making contracts with private companies or individuals, which almost always led to loss on the part of the General Government. If these companies violated the charters extended to them, there was always some pretext set up, or some reason assigned, why the law should not be put in force against them. Besides, the carrying of the United States mail, &c. was so remote a contingency as scarcely to weigh any thing in the matter.

Mr. NILES contended that would not amend the matter, as it would be merely making the State of Indiana a trustee for the company.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. SMITH, TIPTON, NILES, ALLEN, and others, when

Mr. SMITH said he had but a very few words to say in reply, he must however express his surprise to hear the objections which had been urged by the Senator from Connecticut. That Senator denounces the bill as containing the principles of a bargain—he deprecates bargains as horrible and unholy; he confines himself however to public bargains, Legislative bargains. Mr. S. said, without any reference whatever to that Senator, for he believed him to be an honorable and honest man, he must say that when he heard gentlemen crying bargain, intrigue, and corruption, he was always reminded of an occurrence that took place in his State some years since: he would tell it to the Senator from Connecticut, by way of following the example of that Senator, who he had discovered was fond of anecdotes. One morning on the opening of the court in one of the counties on the Ohio river, a motion was made to admit, ex gratia, a person as a member of the bar. The applicant handed up to the court a paper purporting to be a license from the Judges of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky. The judge who was a man of a high order of talents, and a close observer of men and things, held the paper rather longer than the would-be attorney liked; when he rose, and asked the judge if he thought that paper a forgery. The judge instantly turned his piercing eye on him, and said: "What put that into your head, sir?" The applicant for the high honors of the profession, immediately left the court-house; and when the judges went to dinner, shortly afterwards, he had taken a boat and gone down the river. The truth was, the paper was a forgery. So, sir, it is always suspicious to hear gentlemen harping on these things. The question is at once suggested, "what put that into your head, sir." He would suggest to the Senator from Connecticut, that not a new State in the Union had been admitted, except upon contract. Let him look at the acts of admission—let him look to the acts of cession—and indeed let him look to every operation of the Government, and he will find that the whole machinery is propelled by bargain and contract. Mr. S. was not to be alarmed by the cry of bargain and corruption. He did not pretend to any greater share of honesty than other gentlemen; but he could assure the Senator from Connecticut, that he felt himself to stand on such grounds, that he could do his duty fearlessly, without dreading the suspicions of any one, as to the purity of his motives. Mr. S. then went into an examination of the objections that had been urged against the measure at some length.

Mr. S. concluded by saying he would offer an amendment, which might probably be satisfactory to the Senator from Ohio. He would move to amend the bill so that it should read "to grant it to the State for the use of the Mount Carmel and New Albaay Railroad Company.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out all after the enacting clause; on which question he asked the yeas and nays; when there appeared for it 23, against it 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Swift, White and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Fulton, Linn, Merrick, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Tipton, Wall, Webster, and Young—11.

Mr. TIPTON then prepared an amendment, asking the right for the company to purchase the lands at $1 25 per acre, on a credit of six years, and intimating at the same time that he was not authorized by the company to make any such move. The company had never doubted but Congress would at once have granted all that was asked in the original bill.

Mr. BENTON expressed his willingness to give the company all the land on that condition, if it would receive it.

After some further remarks, the bill was postponed, and the amendment of Mr. TIPTON ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then moved to take up the bill for the establishment of the Territory of Iowa, received from the House, with various amendments. Mr. C. moved to concur with the House in its amendments, as they were of an unimportant character, relating chiefly to the salaries of the offices, which were diminished, so as to make them more favorable to economy on the part of the Government. The first was the salary of the Governor, which was reduced from $2,000 to $1,500.

Mr. WEBSTER said, before he consented to this reduction, he should like to learn how this salary corresponded with that of the Governors of other Territories.

Mr. BENTON expressed himself averse to creating any distinction between the two Governors on the opposite sides of the river, and particularly as the Governor of Iowa would be on the more immediate Indian border. Mr. B. said it had been the practice formerly to allow the Governors of Territories $4,000—$2,000 of which was for Governor, and $2,000 as Superintendent of Indian Affairs. Offices in the vicinity of Indians, he well knew, were subject to the heaviest expenses. Unless they treated the Indians, who came to see them, with hospitality and courtesy, they were sure to be despised, and never could exercise any influence over them. Hospitality was a peculiar trait in the savage character; you could never visit the humblest of the race without being invited to partake of refreshment; and the white man, particularly the Governor, that did not return it, would be contemned by them.

This amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was the reduction of the salaries of the District Judges from $1800 to $150 .

Mr. ROBINSON hoped this reduction would not be concurred in; the salary would be very inadequate to the wants of these officers. It was one of the dearest countries for living in the United States; more so, he was prepared to say, even than New Orleans.

Mr. TIPTON thought the salary sufficient; and that plenty of men, competent to fill such offices, were to be had at the price stipulated in the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS thought the salary would range pretty equal with the salaries of the judges in the different States.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that the time to come must be taken into consideration; provisions might be dear now on account of emigration, but this could not continue so in a Territory which was one of the finest farming and grazing countries in the world.

Mr. PRESTON moved to lay the whole bill on the table; there was no necessity for the adoption of another Territory just now.

Mr. HUBBARD asked if this motion were in order.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky. Yes, sir, perfectly in order; and we will only have to vote it down.

The question was then taken on laying the bill on the table, by yeas and nays; when there appeared yeas 6, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Lumpkin, Preston, Sevier, Spence, Strange, White—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Conn. Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter Wall, Webster, Williams and Young—33.

The amendments from the House were then all concurred in.

The Senate then went into the consideration of executive business, and afterwards

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, June 7, 1838.

SURVEYS OF THE LAKES.

The first business in order was the consideration of the following resolution, reported some days since from the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to the House of Representatives, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a copy of each survey, and chart accompanying the same, that has been heretofore made, of the shores, harbors, inlets, and waters, of Lake Erie; also, a copy of each similar survey that has been made of Lake Michigan.

The question was on the following amendment of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause such parts of Lakes Ontario, Erie, St. Clair, Huron, Michigan, and Champlain, and the bays contiguous, and the rivers and straits connected with said lakes, as are within the United States, and the waters of Chesapeake Bay, and creeks adjacent thereto, to be surveyed, when he may deem the same to be necessary to add security and safety to the navigation or commerce on those waters, or for any naval or military operations that may be required on the same for the protection and defence of the northern frontier, and accurate maps and charts of such surveys to be made; and for that purpose he is hereby authorized to employ any public vessel or craft within those waters; and to detail for such service such persons as are employed on board of such vessels or crafts, and others in public employ, when the same can be done without injury to other branches of the public service; and that he cause the shoals, rocks, and other obstructions, and the channels into the bays, mouths of rivers, and through the straits, when said channels are intricate, to be designated by buoys, or in such other suitable manner as he may direct.

And the question pending was on the amendment thereto by Mr. STANLEY, to include the waters of Cove, Albemarle, and Pamlico Sounds, North Carolina.

This amendment was now agreed to; and thus amended, Mr. WHITTLESEY's amendment being agreed to, and the resolution being on its engrossment—

Mr. ADAMS remarked upon the superfluousness of including the Carolina waters, as they were included in the general coast survey that had been going on for so many years. [Mr. MALLORY said said they would not be reached for twenty years, and Mr. STANLEY said the river bays or sounds were not included in the coast survey.] Mr. A. said there was an obvious diversity of opinion, but he was not opposed to the merits of the resolution, as it proposed carrying out the system of internal improvements; but there ought to be an appropriation and a bill reported for that purpose.

Mr. WHITTLESEY explained that no appropriations or improvement were contemplated. It was a simple proposition to employ the officers already on the spot in discovering and designating the shoals, islands, and bars in the lakes. This was the original design, and Chesapeake bay and the waters of North Carolina had been engrafted on it by others. No appropriation was asked for or required, for none was necessary.

Mr. CUSHMAN was in favor of the resolution, which did not involve the expenditure of a single dollar; and in order, therefore, to bring the House to a vote, he demanded the previous question, which was seconded, ayes 103, noes not counted; and the main question being ordered thereon—

Mr. MALLORY asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the resolution was ordered to a third reading without a division, this day.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William Dixon; which was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. W. also reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Rassalas Whitcomb, Geo. C. Van Zandt, Willard Barrows, Thomas Brown, N. Brookfield, Andrew Porter, John Wharrey, John Milroy, and James A. Rosseau, and that the same, with the documents accompanying, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury for settlement under the contracts made by the petitioners with the United States to survey public lands, and for payment under existing appropriations, for surveying the public lands.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported without amendment, Senate bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund for purposes of internal improvement in that State.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported against Senate bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Sandford; and the same was laid on the table.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back the amendment of the Senate to the House bill giving the assent of Congress to an amendatory act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, chartering the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, with a further amendment, recommended by the committee, and they were all committed to a committee on the Union.

Mr. BOND, from the select committee to which the subject had been referred, reported a bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office.

On Mr. B's motion, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. KILGORE asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the operation of so much of the act of June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public moneys," as prohibits the receipt of the notes or bills of specie paying banks, which have issued since the 4th July, 1836, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars, be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

And be it further resolved, That the operation of the second section of the act of April 14, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensions of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

Objection being made,

Mr. K. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. REED asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 96, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Bell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. So the House refused to suspend the rules, not being two thirds.

Mr. HARPER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims made an unfavorable report on the petition of the heirs of Doctor J. S. Pell, and on the petition of Wm. Roberts, jr.

Mr. CARTER then moved to make the bill to extend the pension system the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

Objection being made, Mr. C. moved for a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refusing the latter, Mr. C. modified his motion, by asking for two hours only on that day, and made a few remarks on the importance of the measure.

Mr. BOON suggested to limit it from the journal till 10 o'clock; which Mr. C. accepted as a modification of his motion.

Mr. SHIELDS suggested Saturday next.

Mr. YELL moved Friday.

The CHAIR replied that the rules must first be suspended before the motion could be made.

The House refused to suspend.

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally; which was agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. CRAIG in the Chair.

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, moved to take up the pre-emption right bill; which was agreed to 101 to 46.

The Senate "bill to grant pre-emption rights to actual settlers," was then taken up, and read at the Clerk's table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the reading of the former pre-emption law, which having been done, the CHAIR propounded the question on the first amendment, proposed by the House committee on the public lands, which was to accept from the operations of the pre-emption, the Miami reserve in the State of Indiana, acquired by treaty, of which the proclamation was made by the President of the United States on the 22d of December last.

Mr. BOON then rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman, said he, the subject under consideration was one of very deep interest to a numerous and most meritorious class of citizens of the new States and Territories, and that he, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and as a Western man, felt it to be his duty to offer a few remarks in support of the measure proposed to be adopted. In thedischarge of the duty thus devolved upon me, said Mr. B. I shall at least have the satisfaction to know that I shall be found laboring to protect the rights and interests of a class of my fellow-citizens, many of whom have removed far from the land of their fathers, in search of a country and a home for themselves and families, and have settled on the public lands in good faith and with an honest intention of becoming the purchasers of their little improvements, so soon as circumstances would enable them to do so. And now, sir, what does the present bill propose to do? It contains no new principle whatever, but simply provides that there shall be granted to the present settlers on the public lands that which, by former acts of Congress, has been repeatedly granted to others who were similarly situated.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that many gentlemen of the old thirteen States of this Confederacy are, and ever have been, opposed to almost every measure calculated to benefit the new States of the West. But, said Mr. B. I had not, or could not have, believed, until very recently, that there could be found an individual of any political creed whatever, hailing from the Great West, ready to denounce all those who had at any time settled on the public lands, as a band of "lawless intruders and land pirates." But, sir, a most meritorious class of citizens of the new States have been thus grossly denounced by men high in office, and from a quarter, too, from whence so hostile an attack upon western men and western interests was least to have been expected or looked for; and though I will not descend to the use of language of like unstatesmanlike character by way of retort, I may be permitted to say that I know hundreds and thousands of individuals who at different periods of time settled upon the public lands before they became purchasers thereof, whose characters for honesty, integrity, and patriotism would not suffer by a faithful comparison with that of any individual who may, at any time, have thus denounced a meritorious class of citizens, to whom the country at large, and the West in particular, is under the deepest and most lasting obligations; a class of citizens, sir, whose spirit for enterprise is unequalled, and whose manly courage has never been surpassed in the hour of their country's danger from an invading foe. I rejoice, said Mr. B. to know that in our heaven-favored America, a freeman is neither disfranchised in consequence of his poverty, nor in consequence of his having settled upon the public lands; and I trust, sir, that every despised and abused settler upon the Government lands will, on all fit and proper occasions, cause his just weight and influence to be felt and respected by all aspirants to office. Sir, said Mr. B. to what class of citizens do we look for soldiers to fight the battles of our common country? Is it to the land speculators, the rich, and the "well born," that we look? No, sir, no: it is to the laboring poor men of the country, including the abused settlers upon the public lands, who have been denounced within the walls of this Capitol, on more than one occasion, as a band of "lawless intruders and land pirates." And, sir, shall we now refuse to protect this meritorious class of our fellow citizens in their just claims upon the favor of the Government under which they live? I trust not, Mr. Chairman.

Sir, if you but trace the history of the new States and Territories from their earliest settlement by a white population up to the present period of time, it will be perceived that much the greater portion of the entire population of those States and Territories, settled upon the public lands before they became purchasers; and it is to this description of population, more than to any other, that the Government is mainly indebted for the value that has been given to your vast public domain. But for the spirit of enterprise displayed by the adventurous sons of the West, much the greater portion of the now cultivated regions west of the mountains, would, until the present period of time, have remained in a state of nature, and the habitation of the aborigines, and beasts of prey.

Sir, continued Mr. B. having been myself a partaker of the many privations in life which attend those who are the settlers of a new country, I feel that I am thereby enabled to judge more correctly of the many privations which is experienced by those who, at different periods of time, have settled upon the public lands in the Western wilds. Twenty-seven years ago, sir, I removed from the State of Kentucky to the then Territory of Indiana, with a wife and four small children; and being at that time unable to make payment for a lot of land for a home for myself and family, I, like many others, settled upon the public lands with good intentions, when my nearest neighbor was a hostile Indian, and my only shelter from the storm, and my protection from danger, was an open camp; and the bark of the elm tree when spread upon the cold earth served both as my floor and my carpet. And, for more than five long years, the meal of which my daily bread was made I had to grind on a hand mill. Such, Mr. Chairman, are a few of the very many hardships which were experienced by the early settlers in the western wilds; and such are they who, on more than one occasion, have been denounced within the walls of this Capitol as a band of "lawless intruders and land pirates." Sir, continued Mr. B. all that I will say to those individuals, who have thus given utterance to such course and unmerited abuse of a meritorious class of American citizens, is that they deserve only, as they will receive, the utter scorn and contempt of every individual who at any time has settled upon the public lands.

Some gentlemen are opposed to pre-emption laws, because, say they, such a policy if adopted, would so far change the present land system, as to greatly diminish the annual amount of revenue now receivable from public lands. Now if gentlemen will but examine this subject a little better, they will readily perceive that land sales, at public auction, since 1820, have, on an average, produced only about six and one quarter of a cent per acre more than the Government price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I put it to gentlemen to say whether they really consider the pecuniary interest of the Government in this small matter, involving only the trifling sum of six and one-fourth cents an acre more than the present Government price, of such importance, as to induce the Government to drive from the public lands, the present settlers, for the purpose of enriching the Treasury, and to benefit the speculator? Sir, suppose you refuse to protect the actual settler by pre-emption right, what are the consequences which will follow? Why, sir, the poor settler will attend the public land sales, and bid for the lot which has been made valuable, and perhaps saleable, only by his labor, until driven from competition by a mere man of straw, procured to bid at the public land sales by a combination of speculators. And when the actual settlers are thus driven from the sales; this man of straw thus procured to bid against the settlers, forfeits his bids, the land reverts back to Government for non-payment of the purchase money, and is then entered by the speculator at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. This, sir, is, to a very considerable extent, the effect produced by the present system of land at public auction. The Government, under such a system, is no gainer, while the poor settler loses his all, and is afterwards compelled to content himself with the purchase of Government lands of an inferior quality, or he must purchase better lands from the speculator at greatly advanced prices.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it will not be contended by any, one that it would be either a wise or judicious policy on the part of the Government to adopt any system that would have a tendency to cripple or retard the growth or improvement of the new States; and more especially when the Government would be no gainer by the measure. No, sir: it should rather be the policy of the Government to sell her lands to individuals in tracts of limited parcels, and at reduced prices. The price that has been long fixed by law as the Government price per acre, is one dollar and twenty-five cents, and is believed to be sufficiently high for any lands sold by the Government; and it cannot, in justice, be denied that the actual settler and cultivator should have a preference over the speculator. If you grant the right of pre-emption to actual settlers to one quarter section, as is proposed by the present bill, the Government will receive one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for all the lands sold under the present land system at private entry; and if you first offer your lands for sale at public auction, the Government will receive but a small fraction more on the acre, than the minimum Government price. But not even that fraction will be received, where combinations exist; and but few public land sales have taken place of late years, where combinations by speculators did not exist. I consider, therefore, that the Government has no adequate pecuniary interest sufficient to induce it to drive from the public lands the actual settler, for the benefit of the speculator.

I am aware, said Mr. B. that pre-emption laws have been objected to on the ground that they involve conflicting claims and clashing interests, and other evil consequences. This was the case under the act which authorized floating claims. But, sir, the present bill guards against like consequences in future. It provides that where two or more persons have settled upon, and cultivated any one quarter section of land, each of them shall have an equal share therein, but shall have no claim to lands elsewhere by virtue of this bill, should it become a law.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the general provisions of the present bill, as it came from the Senate, and having received the approval of a majority of the Public Land committee on the part of this House. Sir, said Mr. B. if time would permit me, I might go much more at length into the discussion of this subject; but I am not much in the practice of making speeches on this floor "for Buncombe;" and knowing that there is other business of much importance to the country and to individuals to be acted upon in the short time yet remaining of the present session of Congress, I will conclude my remarks by saying that, to my mind, there is no measure whatever which recommends itself more strongly to the favor of Congress, upon every principle of justice and humanity, towards a meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, who have settled in the western wilds.

Mr. EWING said he would not make a speech for Buncombe nor for the House, nor should he enter into a history of his life; for, when he gave that, he should give it entire. He spoke highly of the character of the squatters, and referred to an alleged attack made upon them elsewhere by an individual, [Mr. CLAY,] which he pronounced false, and said such an attack had never been made.

Mr. E. moved to amend the amendment by granting to the State the right of pre-emption to the Miami reserve lands, except to those already settled, which he stated to be only by about half a dozen families.

Mr. CHAPMAN inquired if the amendment, which proposed to give a State a grant of land was in order. He hoped the gentleman would withdraw it, and bring it forward upon some other occasion, as it had the effect of embarrassing the bill.

Mr. EWING said it was intimately connected with pre-emption rights to public lands, and the disposition to be made of them; and was so intimately connected that they could not be separated.

Mr. HEROD called for a division of the question on Mr. EWING's amendment, so as to take the question first on that branch of it giving the pre-emption to the State, and next on that in relation to the individual settlers on the Miami lands.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana remarked that that the proposition to grant pre-emption rights to a State was new in principle. Lands had been granted heretofore to the States, but never pre-emption to them.

Mr. EWING denied there was any novelty in the principle, unless the bill itself was a new one; and who would deny a right to a whole sovereign State, which was not refused to its citizens.

Mr. DUNN, in view of the existence of the combinations that would be formed at the sale, did not believe the United States would acquire more from the proceeds, than if the State of Indiena got it at the minimum price. Moreover, by granting it to the State, the Treasury would be in the immediate receipt of the money.

Mr. POPE suggested that the amendment should be altered so as to compel the State, if she entered any part of the lands, to take the whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD explained, and severely condemned the whole plan. It was giving a State the privilege of speculating on the lands, over the heads of the settlers; and, after the grant was made, the State would apportion out the land, and watch those boys who were about to squat. He said if pre-emption rights were to be granted at all, he would say hands off from all distinctions—let the settlers stand upon equal terms every where. The land, he was told, was worth three, four, and five dollars an acre; and instead of allowing the State of Indiana to speculate, and pocket the profit, he would prefer to alter the law so as to compel settlers to pay those prices, and let the United States have the profit.

Mr. DUNN replied with an argument to show that it was proper to benefit the State, because the principle of granting pre-emptions was intended to reward those who went and settled the western lands in advance of others; and such persons would have the benefit of this provision.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, opposed the amendment, It was enough for him to know that it proposed to benefit the State of Indiana; and, if that State was to be benefitted, he wished to know how a distinction could be drawn between that State and others. Why, he asked, should not the old States be benefitted in the increase of value? or why should a preference be given to Indiana over other States containing public lands.

Mr. HEROD gave an explanation of the situation in which these lands were; and advocated the amendment.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative.

So the amendment offered by Mr. EWING was rejected without a division.

The question then recurred upon the original amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, again advocated the amendment of Mr. EWING, on the ground that it would be brought forward hereafter as a distinct proposition, and appeared to prefer it not embarrassing the pre-emption bill.

Mr. CASEY remarked that the amendment appeared to him to be superfluous, on the ground that the following clause in the body of the bill, would exclude the Miami Reserve—it was in these words: "That this act shall not be so construed as to give a right of pre-emption to any person, or persons, in consequence of any settlement or improvement made before the extinguishment of the Indian title to the land on which such settlement or improvement was made"

Mr. BOON remarked that if Mr. CASEY's construction was the correct one, still the amendment of the Committee on the Public Lands could do no harm, as it might make the bill itself less objectionable to those who were opposed to it.

Mr. GOODE then moved to amend the amendment by granting the reserved alternate sections at the price of $2 50 per acre, on the Miami canal line, in that State, to the State of Ohio, except those sections now settled and improved.

Mr. SNYDER hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio would not prevail. It proposed to grant an exclusive right to the State of Ohio, in exclusion to individuals. The present bill is one extending to the settlers on public lands the right of pre-emption to one quarter section. Its principles are general and equitable; its object is to protect the labor of the poor man from the rapacity of the wealthy speculator. The proposition of the gentleman will embarrass, if adopted, the progress and passage of this bill; and I deny that it is consonant with the principles of the measure now under consideration. This bill extends to the settlers on the public lands protection, and a guarantee for their labor; and, on the other hand, the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio would engross the most valuable lands exclusively for the State of Ohio, and refuse the right of pre-emption to the settlers on that portion of the public domain. I, for one, cannot consent that this bill shall be so encumbered. If the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio has merits, I will vote for it in a separate and distinct bill. There has been abundant time during all of this long session to propose his measure; there is yet time. I hope the friends of a pre-emption will join me in voting down this amendment, so that this important bill for the relief of a most meritorious class of citizens will stand on its own merit, and speedily meet with the favorable action of this House. When the principles of this bill come up for discussion, I shall avail myself of the occasion to present my views more fully on the subject.

The amendment of the House committee was then agreed to.

The next amendment was in relation to certain fractions in Palmyra district, Missouri, which was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an amendment, the effect of which was to prevent persons from getting more than one pre-emption.

Mr. LINCOLN remarked that he had submitted the following amendment, when the bill was originally reported:

"To insert in the 25th line, after the words United States, the following words: 'Nor shall the benefit of this act extend to any person who has before availed himself of a pre-emption right to the entry of any of the public lands, and acquired a title thereto by reason of such entry.'"

Mr. UNDERWOOD having temporarily withdrawn his, Mr. LINCOLN moved the above.

Mr. U. said the gentleman's amendment did not provide for the mode of ascertaining the fact, and he therefore preferred his own and moved it, as it required the settler to set forth his disclaimer on oath.

Mr. LINCOLN'S objection to that was, that he always disapproved of putting an individual's rights on the faith of his own testimony. It was a dangerous practice, and he, therefore, preferred his own amendment.

Mr. L. then went at large into a review of the bill, and contended for the right of the old States to the public lands in common with the new States, and that they should not be given away either to settlers or to new States. He was in favor of granting these pre-emption rights to settlers; but wished to restrict them, so that the same person could not take one pre-emption after another, and thus cover an undue quantity of land. He also made and argued the point, that a pre-emption right should be gained only by some service in making improvements, and that merely because he staid on a quarter section of land over night, he should not acquire a right to purchase it in the morning. He went upon the ground, that lands not offered for sale by the Government might be secured by pioneers, who settled and improved the land, but that a mere temporary stopping should not give a pre-emption right, because he did no good to the country and performed no service to entitle him to the right. He would offer an amendment to make the residence four months next preceding the first of December, so that those who went and sowed wheat, and felled timber, and established a house, should acquire a right to it, and not be liable to be turned out houseless after he had done the service of a pioneer and had become a citizen and a resident. Such an amendment he thought as liberal as Western people could justly ask; and, coupled with the one then before the committee, that the pioneer should have but one pre-emption right, instead of allowing him to monopolize, he was willing to go for the bill. Should such propositions be called illiberal, he was willing to be denounced here and at home; but he would also be willing to appeal to a jury of Western men, to decide upon their justice.

Mr. L. then discussed the policy of the measure as affecting the prices of lands and the interests of the old States.

Mr. MAY moved an amendment to extend the law granting pre-emption rights to any persons who may now or shall hereafter have lived twelve months upon the public lands; and, after some remarks upon objections made by Mr. LINCOLN to the bill in its present shape, he went at length into an argument to show the expediency of the measure he proposed to insert in the bill.

Mr. BOON replied to the remarks of Mr. LINCOLN, chiefly to the point relative to obtaining successive and separate pre-emption rights. He did not think such occurrences could take place often; and if it did now and then, when an actual settler moved from one location to a better, he thought no evil would accrue.

Mr. LINCOLN said, according to his notion, the person who removed in such a manner was a speculator.

Mr. LOOMIS spoke at length in favor of actual settlers upon the public lands, and was in favor of affording them every facility which could be granted, with proper safeguards against frauds. He was opposed to selling the lands in large quantities to non-residents, to hold and sell hereafter. If any benefit was to accrue from an increase of value, it ought to go to actual settlers, or remain to the United States, instead of being given to speculators. He did not understand the policy of confining the application of the bill to settlers up to December last, and did not see why it should not be brought down to the present time, or to the first of June; and he read a letter from a western correspondent to show that it would be a hardship to those who came a little later than the day set, and had been compelled to settle upon lands not brought into the market, with the expectation of acquiring a pre-emption right. He proposed to offer an amendment at the end of the bill, to provide for a prospective system of settling and acquiring pre-emption rights, when such an amendment should be in order.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the committee rise, with a view to have the amendments printed.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana wished that a vote might be taken on some of the merely verbal amendments already offered. He had some time since proposed an amendment, and had it printed, which he intended to offer as a substitute for the bill; but, since then, he had, upon consultation with a competent officer of the land office, made some very important alterations, and he had a strong hope that it would now meet the assent of a large majority of the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH again moved that the committee rise; but gave way to

Mr. LINCOLN, who moved another amendment, with a view to have it printed with the rest.

Mr. RANDOLPH then renewed his motion to rise, which was carried in the affirmative; and the committee rose and reported.

By general consent, the bill and various amendments pending, and notice of given, were all ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BRONSON moved to take up the bill in reation to the Rock River and Lake Michigan Canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved an adjournment: lost—only 29 voting for it.

The above bill was then taken up, the question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in sundry amendments.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana moved several verbal amendments, which were agreed to, as did also Mr. McKAY.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved an amendment giving the State the equity of revocation; but it was disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading to-morrow—ayes 94, noes 34.

Sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

The Senate's amendment to the House bill, to s cure the payment on certain commissions on duty bonds to collectors of the customs, was taken up, and agreed to.

Also, the amendments to the House bill for the relief of Moses Merrill.

The following were read a third time:

The joint resolution for the further distribution of the Documentary History of the Revolution was read the third time and passed.

The joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made, was then taken up.

Mr. MALLORY opposed the resolution, and insisted that it would involve an appropriation of $500,000, adding that it was attempted to be smuggled through. Moreover, the persons proposed to make the surveys were not competent.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio warmly repelled this allegation, and went into a defence of his course in sustaining the resolution, giving the reasons that had induced western men, whose States bordered on the lakes to sustain it. No expense was intended, nor would the President be justified in incurring any under it.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an adjournment: lost.

Mr. BRONSON was satisfied that, if the persons on the southern waters were not competent to the performance, those on the lakes were.

After some further remarks from Messrs. ADAMS, FILLMORE, and HAYNES,

Mr. H. moved to commit the resolution to the Committee on Commerce, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of reporting back for a survey of our whole seaboard, lakes included.

Mr. GRANT moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. GOODE, who, after some remarks, renewed it, and it was sustained by the House, 90 to 36, and the main question was ordered, put, and agreed to.

So the resolution was passed.

The following were also passed:

An act to reorganize the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, and for other purposes.

An act to confirm an act of the Legislative Council of Florida, incorporating the Florida and Peninsula Steamboat and Railroad Company, granting right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. WORD, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Carrollton, in the county of Carroll, in the State of Mississippi, to Douglass, on the Yazoo river; and also from Grenada, in the county of Talaboosha, via Preston and Oakland, to Panola, in Panola county.

Mr. CHAPMAN then said, for the purpose of testing the sense, he would move to make the preemption bill the special order of the day for tomorrow, after the hour of one o'clock, when the other orders would be disposed of.

Mr. BRIGGS interposing a motion to that effect, which prevailed, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, June 7, 1838.

Mr. LYON presented the memorial of thirty-two citizens of Michigan, members of the bar, and others, praying Congress to change the place of holding the circuit and district court of the United States for the State of Michigan, from the city of Detroit to Ann Arbor, in said State.

Mr. LYON said the memorialists stated that jurors and witnesses were put to much expense and inconvenience by the holding of the court at Detroit, which would be saved to them by holding it at Ann Arbor, where the throng of emigrants and travellers was not so great, and where the money they would receive would be at least sufficient to pay their board bills while in attendance on the court. They also stated that a great portion of the business of the court originated in the interior of the State, nearer and more convenient to Ann Arbor than Detroit; that at the former place the court could occupy commodious buildings free of rent, and without the interruption to which it is now frequently subject in Detroit from the sessions of other courts occupying the same room with itself.

Mr. SEVIER said he was not in his seat yesterday when the report on the Oregon Territory was ordered to be printed. As it was a document of great interest to the American public, he would move that 15,000 extra copies be added.

Mr. SOUTHARD thought the number unusually large.

Mr. SEVIER then suggested 10,000; which were accordingly ordered.

On motion of Mr. HUBBABD, the Committee on Pensions was instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to John McNeil.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a petition from an individual (unheard) in Clark county, Indiana.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to authorize a selection of lands for the benefit of the University of Michigan, in lieu of other lands heretofore selected: read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill supplementary to the act of March, 1835, to establish branches of the Mint of the United States: read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LYON, on leave, introduced a bill to create the office of the Surveyor of the Public Lands in Michigan: read twice, and referred.

Mr. MORRIS submitted a resolution, which lies over one day, instructing the Committee on the Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of ceding to the State of Ohio all the public lands remaining unsold within her limits, and of making the same provision for other States as soon as the public land remaining unsold within their respective boundaries should bear the same proportion [to something unheard by the reporter] as it now does in the State of Ohio; or, if this should be deemed inexpedient, that the committee inquire how many of the land offices in Ohio can be abolished without injury to the public service.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The resolution offered on Tuesday by Mr. MORRIS, that Congress adjourn on the 2d of July to the second Monday in November next, and that no member of Congress receive compensation for services during the recess, came up in its order.

Mr. MORRIS explained, and advocated his resolution at some length, assigning as the principal reason for adopting it that, if the Senate should meet before the Constitutional time for a new session, they could take up their unfinished business, and proceed with it in the same manner as if there had been no recess.

Mr. NORVELL moved that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LUMPKIN moved that it be laid on the table; which motion, taking precedence, was put to the vote, and carried.

THE NEW TREASURY CIRCULAR.

Mr. WEBSTER'S resolution, offered yesterday, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a copy of such order as he might have recently issued in regard to receiving bank notes, coming up for consideration,

Mr. WEBSTER said a Treasury order had been published, which it was proper should be officially communicated to the Senate. When speaking on the joint resolution which lately passed, [said Mr. W.] I observed that some further legal provision would be necessary, if the resolution should pass. This expectation is quite confirmed by the new circular. As to some of the conditions, or limitations, stated by the Secretary, it is true that they are imposed by existing statutes, and must be regarded; such as that the bills of no bank should be received, which bank since June, 1836, has issued, or paid out, bills less than five dollars. As all the banks in some of the States, and nearly all in others, are in this predicament, it is necessary, undoubtedly, that some act of legislation should be passed, in order to make the recent resolution of any practical effect in those States.

There are other parts of the new circular, however, of which I do not see the necessity, even as the case now stands.

It is proper, however, that the paper should be officially before us, as undoubtedly some further legislation will be necessary; and I shall myself propose some measure on the subject at an early day.

The resolution was adopted without dissent.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Treasury Department, in pursuance of a Senate resolution of May 2d, with a condensed statement of the condition of the State deposite banks, derived from the latest returns, together with the returns on which the statement was founded: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Several bills were received from the House, read twice, and referred.

The Senate concurred in the amendments of the other House to the bill to establish the office of Surveyor General for Wisconsin.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of Robert Keyworth.

The bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain pre-emption claims to land in Indiana.

The bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefit of the act of June, 1834, granting pre-emption rights; and

The bill to settle the construction of the act regulating the pay of paymasters in the army.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to consider the House bill making appropriations for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities for 1838, and for the payment of arrearages in 1837.

On ordering this bill to its third reading, Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate, and was answered by Mr. WRIGHT, when Mr. PRESTON spoke at length, reflecting generally on the war and its causes, which he attributed to the fault of the Administration.

Mr. LUMPKIN addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I had indulged the hope, and still indulge it, that the Senate would be permitted to act promptly on this appropriation bill, without bringing into its discussion the exciting topics of the Florida and Cherokee treaties, and the Florida war. The service of the country and the character of the Government are at this time suffering for the want of the passage of this bill. Drafts amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars are at this moment pressed upon the Treasury of the country, and cannot be discharged till we pass this bill. The citizens of the country, who have given full and fair consideration for official and legal drafts on your Treasury, ought not to be delayed in receiving their just dues.

It is, therefore, with extreme reluctance that I feel myself called upon to take some notice of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] I shall not, however, follow the gentleman in the wide range he has taken in regard to the Florida campaign, or the merit or demerit of the distinguished officers who have had command in Florida. For the present I leave all these gentlemen (with my kind regard) to the justice of that public opinion, to whom we, as public men, are all amenable. There is but one point connected with the Florida war to which the gentleman has adverted, which I feel myself called upon to notice.

The gentleman, with his usual eloquence, has eulogised the savage chief Oseola, apparently forgetful of the many horrid deeds which led to the catastrophe of this extraordinary man. When I hear Oseola eulogised on the floor of this Senate, I can but remember the treachery of this much indulged man to his friend and benefactor, the lamented General Wiley Thompson of Georgia, with whom I was long associated in public life, and who was long a respected member of the other branch of Congress. Yes, this bloodthirsty Oseola, not only murdered General Thompson, but was, and has been, the principal organ of all the horrors of the Florida war, indiscriminately levelled against every age and sex. Sir, if I fail to express my sympathy in strains of equal eloquence with the Senator from South Carolina for the sufferings of the deserving portion of the native race, I will not yield to the gentleman my claims to feelings as refined, enlarged, and sympathetic for suffering humanity, even when a savage is the victim. I avow myself the friend and defender of the just rights and true interest of the native race. But I am far, very far, from being the eulogist, or apologist of Oseola. I can but think of his name with horror and disgust.

But, sir, my anxiety for the speedy passage of this bill would have induced me to vote in silence, after all the the remarks of the gentleman upon the Florida part of the subject, if the gentleman had stopped there. But, sir, he has come nearer home to me; and I feel bound to defend my own premises. The gentleman has given us a history of his support and defence of the Cherokee treaty of 1835, and has manifested marked zeal in the defence of my State, and a portion of its public functionaries. I thank him kindly for all this voluntary service. It is a free will offering, which I feel assured will be duly appreciated by the friends of the treaty and of the State.

But, sir, we find mingled with all this support of the treaty, and zeal to have it faithfully and speedily executed, a spirit and bearing in the remarks of the gentleman, which, to my mind, is calculated to do great injustice to the Administration which made and has sustained this treaty; as well as the friends of the Administration, who have borne the heat and burden of the day, in bringing our Indian relations to their present attitude.

The gentlemen reminds me of what I have often seen in the course of a life not now a very short one, that is: persons vociferous in a'cause after the victory was achieved, and persons, too, who stood aloof while the battle raged.

Sir, I will never permit the Senator from South Carolina, uncontested, to step in at this late day, and carry off whatever meed of praise may be due to those who have struggled so long to relieve my beloved State from an Indian population. I truly thank him for all his kind feelings and services to my State, and her citizens, whether private or public men. But all this kindness and zeal for my State and her distinguished citizens, shall not induce me silently to asquiesce in direct or indirect censure, when improperly cast upon me, or the Administration of the Federal Government which I support. My position in relation to this matter shall not be misunderstood or misrepresented without the proper correction. I am fully apprized of the fact, that the late communication of the President of the United States to Congress, embracing the letter of the Secretary of War to John Ross, is at this time a most fruitful subject for excitement and misrepresentation. I, therefore, deem it my duty to go into a history of this transaction, sustained by such facts as cannot be controverted, and as will do justice to myself, and the Executive Government.

The Cherokee treaty of 1835, after all that has been said to disparage the Government and the Indians who formed it, I repeat, as I have often done before, it is a monument of the magnanimity of the Government on one side, and a standing record of the honesty and pure patriotism of the Cherokees who negotiated it, on the other side.

I was invited, at an early day, to aid as a commissioner in the execution of this treaty, and have been familiar with every important transaction since, up to the present day. The Executive Government has uniformly, and at all times, expressed an unwavering determination to carry out and execute the treaty, without infringement or change of its provisions. It has as uniformly, constantly, and sincerely expressed a desire to discharge this duty in a spirit of the utmost kindness and liberality towards the Cherokee people. In all this I have concurred and co-operated with the Government. But it is nevertheless true, that from the time I entered upon the duties of the appointment of commissioner until I took my seat in this Senate, yes, sir, and up to the present day, some difference of opinion between the Executive Government and myself has existed, on some points touching the best mode of accomplishing the object which we all had in view. I united in the views of the Government, in using every effort within my official range to reconcile the opposing part of the Cherokees to this treaty; and have, to a considerable extent, succeeded.

But I have uniformly dissented, as all my official letters will show while acting as commissioner, to that part of the policy of the Government which has permitted John Ross and his followers, while constantly protesting against the validity of the treaty, receiving the countenance and courtesy which they have done from the Government. I have uniformly believed, and still believe, that the best and safest way to have executed this treaty would have been, from the first, kindly, but firmly, to have used the imperative language to Ross and his followers—to have said the argument is exhausted in regard to the treaty—It must be executed. I believe that no propositions from Ross should ever have been entertained, without being accompanied by a pledge to cease from all opposition to the removal of the Cherokees. But I believe this difference of opinion originated from no difference in object. It was the desire of all to execute the treaty in that manner which might be best for all the parties in interest. From my knowledge of the character of Ross, I had no confidence that he could be conciliated by concessions. Grant one demand, and another would immediately be made. The strong desire of the Government to conciliate Ross and his party has been constantly strengthened by the opinions of many of the officers and agents of the Government, as well as by the opinions of highly respectable citizens of various States, communicated to the Executive Government—that the treaty could never be executed peaceably, without the assent and aid of the opposing party of the Cherokees, therefore, to avoid the evils of an Indian war, which must terminate in the destruction of the Cherokees, as well as some loss of white inhabitants. The Government has, with a patience and forbearance unparalleled, kept an open ear to the untiring perseverance of Ross.

On taking my seat in the Senate, I found Ross and his delegation still here, memorializing Congress, and making propositions to the Executive Government, my mode and manner of meeting which is known to the Senate and to the country. In the month of March, I found, from information derived from different sources, that the Executive Government here was still urged by gentlemen in high official stations, to the policy of conciliating Ross by increased liberality in money. Amongst others, I will read an extract from a letter of Governor Gilmer of Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated March 5, 1838. The Governor says: "The best informed persons residing among the Cherokes express the opinion that Ross can, if he will, remove his people at once. To avoid the great expense to the Government, and to preserve the lives and property of our citizens, and the Indians which may be sacrificed if the treaty is executed by force, the Government can well afford to pay a very liberal price for the voluntary and immediate removal of the Indians. To enable Ross and the chiefs to effect this object, I believe it to be necessary for them first to return home, see their people, and let them be satisfied that their efforts to change the treaty have been honest though unavailing. The Cherokees are so suspicious of their chiefs, that even Ross, as entirely as he has their confidence, might lose all power to serve them if he attempted to make a contract with the Government, for their emigration, before they were consulted, and their approval of the measure obtained. If the Government should ascertain upon Ross's return home, that he had the power, and was willing to undertake the removal of his people, the terms of contract could be agreed upon without difficulty or delay." "If the pertinacity of Ross should create any difficulty, it might be obviated in making no reference in his contract to the treaty."

Very many letters from other persons of high respectability and official standing, to the same purport of Governor Gilmer's, may be found on the files of the War Department. Indeed I have always myself anticipated mischief growing out of the execution of this treaty, unless the influence of Ross was neutralized by force or purchase. Under this aspect of the subject, and after both branches of Congress had given sufficient evidence of a determination to execute the treaty, regardless of the remonstrances of Ross, and the silly petitions of persons wholly ignorant of the subject upon which they were petitioning, I came to the conclusion, that Ross might possibly be in a situation to yield to the true interest of his people, and let them emigrate to the West in peace.

And hence my assent was given to the views suggested in the extract of Gov. Gilmer's letter, which I have read. And while I have uniformly protested against any movement which might in the slightest degree retard the removal of the Cherokees, I have, nevertheless, uniformly and freely expressed the opinion, that the moment when all opposition to the treaty by Ross and his party should be yielded up, and a disposition manifested to emigrate with reasonable despatch, from that moment the Indians would be secured from any unreasonable pressure on the part of the people of Georgia. I repudiate the idea that my constituents would, under such circumstances, act with inhumanity towards the suffering Indians, or refuse to grant every indulgence which the true interest of the Indians and humanity may require. No Senator on this floor is better acquainted with his constituents than I am with mine. They are generous, just, and liberal. Their magnanimity cannot be appealed to in vain. But, sir, they never can be forced into slavish submission, or withdraw from a pending controversy.

But, Mr. President, I now come to the important object which I had in view, in addressing the Senate. I am fully apprised of the great excitement which has been produced in my own State, and elsewhere, arising out of the propositions of the Secretary of War to John Ross, lately submitted to Congress. I am not only apprised of the excitement, but of the misapprehension which seems to exist on this subject. I perceive from the newspapers of Georgia and other States, as well as from the letters which I receive from my constituents, that an impression has been made upon the public mind that the Government was desirous, and had proposed, unnecessarily, to delay the emigration of the Cherokees for two years. This I know to be an entire misapprehension. The extension proposed to the States by the Government, and that in the most delicate and respectful manner, was never intended to embrace a longer period than that which might be required by a due regard to the common dictates of humanity, it being expressly stated that the Cherokees were to be removed as speedily as was consistent with health and comfort. General Scott is, moreover, instructed to continue the prosecution of the measures he has adopted to remove the Indians, and whether their removal is to be effected by compulsion, or voluntary emigration under their own agents, so to conduct his operations as to place the proprietors of the lands there in possession of their property with as little delay as possible. These instructions certainly do not warrant the supposition that the Government consents that Ross and his friends shall remain two years longer.

On the contrary, the orders of the Government are most positive, that the Indians are to be removed from Georgia first, and from the other States as speedily as practicable. This is the plain meaning of the letter of the Secretary of War to John Ross, as intended, understood, and interpreted by the author himself. I admit that the propositions made to John Ross, by the Secretary of War, might have been put in a form less liable to misapprehension. But I am utterly at a loss to account for the wide-spread misapprehension upon this subject, except it be from the fact that it took its rise in both houses of Congress, and thus rapidly spread to the four quarters of the Union. I know positively that the exposition given by the Secretary of War, of his letter to Ross, is perfectly consistent with the views which he expressed to me before making his propositions to Ross. The Secretary had ample grounds to believe that Congress entertained the most liberal feelings towards the Cherokees, and would willingly soothe them, as far as that could reasonably be done, by additional appropriations of money to be applied to their comfort. He had just cause to believe, and did believe, that the high-minded, generous States of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina, would act with becoming humanity and indulgence towards the poor, deluded Cherokees; and the people of those States will not fail to do the present Administration justice on this subject, when the misapprehension and excitement of the present moment shall have passed away.

The position of the Federal Administration of the Government has, upon this Indian subject, for many years past, been most delicate and peculiar. Especially since the commencement of General Jackson's administration, and his manifested determination to relieve the Southern States from the disadvantages of an Indian population. His untiring vigilance and perseverance on this subject is now a part of the history of the Government. In all his exertions to relieve Georgia from her Indians, and do justice to her claims upon the Federal Government, I was not only a faithful co-operator, but sometimes in advance of the President himself. His successor has faithfully adhered to the policy of his predecessor in carrying out these measures.

But at every step a most formidable and peculiar opposition has embarrassed the Government in the prosecution of its Indian policy. The Administration has not only had to encounter the combined and regularly organized Opposition, which were known as open and avowed opponents, but many of the friends of the Administration, especially amongst the less informed, have been used as opponents to the Indian policy of the Government. Even in the States most deeply interested, we have sometimes seen the strong feelings of self-interest, waived to accommodate party spirit and party interest. At any rate I have always found the measures of General Jackson and myself, even in Georgia, discountenanced by some of our political opponents, as far as public opinion would tolerate an expression of disapprobation. The newspapers of the day will show that I was for years censured for the determined and straightforward course which I pursued in paving the way to insure the speedy removal of the Indians from Georgia. Yes, sir, I and my friends have borne the heat and burden of the day on this subject. And now, in the moment of success, in the day of triumph and victory, what is the exhibition which we witness on this floor? Why, sir, we see the honorable Senator from South Carolina, with his characteristic zeal and eloquence, rise in his place, and address this Senate in a mode and manner calculated to produce the impression abroad that the Executive officers of the Government and myself had, all at once, suddenly and without rhyme or reason, abandoned our long-cherished policy, and gone over to the enemy; and that, too, after we had fairly achieved the victory of a hard and long fought battle. Sir, can the Senator believe that he can thus far mislead the public mind? Sir, he is a stranger to my constituents if he believes any man living can make them believe that I have proved recreant to their interest on this Indian subject. They too well know my toils and my labors, my perseverance, my constancy upon this most important subject connected with my public life. No, sir; the Senator cannot make my constituents in Georgia believe that I have abandoned their rights or interests. In Georgia, at this time, we have but one party on this subject. The whole people anxiously desire the speedy execution of the treaty.

And, sir, the opponents of this Administration are greatly deceived, if they put so low an estimate upon the intelligence of the people of Georgia, as to suppose they will find special favor with them for their loud cries of victory in the Indian battle, when they have only entered the field of labor at the eleventh hour. I am willing that these new comers should receive their penny; but I cannot consent to the withholding a just and equal reward to those faithful laborers who have borne the heat and burthen of the day.

Sir, I thank the gentleman again for the zeal which he exhibits in behalf of the interests of the people of Georgia, and for the high compliment he has paid the Governor of my State.

I concede to the Governor of Georgia good intentions, in regard to his views and efforts to conciliate John Ross, and have yielded something of my own opinions in order that I might co-operate with his views and wishes, as well as those of the Executive officers of the Federal Government. I shall always do the Chief Magistrate of my State ample justice, whatever political difference of opinion may happen to exist. I do, however, most solemnly protest against the justice of the effort of the Senator from South Carolina to cast censure and blame upon the President and Secretary of War, as well as myself, for yielding something to the plainly expressed wishes of Governor Gilmer and many of his political friends, especially his northern Whig friends. If there be any error in this matter, the sin lies at the door of the opponents of the Administration; and yet the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] as the organ of the Southern wing of the Opposition, upbraids the Administration and its friends with throwing weighty responsibilities upon the Governor of Georgia. Sir, I would inquire, what is the great responsibility thrown upon the Governors of the four States interested in this matter, even under the misapprehension indulged, that the States had been applied to for two years more time for the emigration of the Cherokees? Why, sir, the only responsibility is, to give an answer in accordance with the known wishes of the whole people over whom they preside. Where is the Governor who need be distressed or embarrassed at such responsibility as this?

Moreover, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] contends and urges that the proposals of the Secretary of War to John Ross amounts to a new treaty, and to an infringement of the treaty of 1835. I am not able myself to put any such construction on the proposals of the Secretary. I know that such was not his intention. The President and Secretary of War have uniformly and firmly assured Ross and his friends that the treaty of New Echota would be executed without infringement or change.

The Secretary, in his proposals to Ross, in the very first sentence, disclaims all right on the part of the Federal Government to enter into any treaty stipulations which might affect the rights of the States. And we find a reiteration of the same sentiments, and sacred regard to the rights of the States, throughout the document under consideration. I call myself an unwavering State Rights man; but I see not the slightest grounds to complain of this document on that score. The present Administration of the Federal Government belong to the good old Republican school of 1798, and therefore are not disposed to infringe upon the rights of the States.

That temporary mischief has grown out of the misapprehensions which have spread over the country in relation to this subject, I am fully aware. But, from the nature of things, I trust that the excitement will soon abate. The constant and daily movements and operations of the Government must surely correct, without delay, any mistaken impressions which may have existed. The Government is moving forward in the discharge of its duty. General Scott's instructions remain unchanged. His character is a sufficient guarantee that his duty will be discharged with fidelity and ability. From various accounts which I have received from the scene of action so far, the preparations and movements connected with Cherokee emigration is going on harmoniously, and with all the promptitude which the nature of the service will allow.

In conclusion, I would beg leave to request the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] to be assured of my fidelity to my constituents, especially upon this Indian subject. I can assure the honorable Senator, that he is wholly mistaken, if he supposes that the bearing of his remarks will even induce the Southern wing of his own party to believe that I have no more self-love than to give a victory to my opponents, which has been achieved by my friends and myself. No, sir, the Senator misapprehends my relation to this subject, as much as he does, the communication of the Secretary of War to John Ross; or he would never have permitted himself to get in the lead of my friends and myself, in zeal for the faithful and speedy execution of the Cherokee treaty.

Mr. LUMPKIN was followed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, STRANGE, SOUTHARD, and WHITE, when the bill was ordered to be engrossed by a unanimous vote, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—40.

[This debate will be given as soon as prepared.]

The bill was about to pass by unanimous consent, when

Mr. HUBBARD stated that Mr. BENTON had expressed to him a desire to address the Senate on its third reading; and,

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 8, 1838.

TREASURY BUILDING.

This being the day set apart, by special order, till one o'clock, for the consideration of the "bill providing for the removal of the walls of the Treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department," the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. POPE in the chair thereon.

A motion was pending to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. LINCOLN submitted the following amendment: "To amend by striking out, in the second section, all after the word 'appropriated,' where it first occurs, and inserting 'any unexpended balances remaining in the Treasury from former appropriations to the construction of a Treasury building.'"

Mr. NAYLOR spoke for sometime in support of the bill.

Mr. KEIM vindicated General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren for the part they had taken, prescribed, as it was, by the existing law, and then went at some length into a general opposition to the bill, and went more particularly into a defence of Mr. Mills, as an accomplished architect; and in reply to some of the allegations in the report, and in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN.] He then went into a statement of details, to show that the building would be sufficient in strength, and in convenience for the Department, and contended for that American simplicity of construction which combines neatness with utility, and is opposed to expensive and ostentatious display.

During the course of Mr. K's remarks, Mr. LINCOLN took occasion to explain, that Mr. Walter had not been originally designated by the committee, and was personally unknown to all of them, and that he had been originally designated as the architect to examine the building by Mr. Van Buren himself.

Mr. KEIM having concluded his remarks—

Mr. PRATT made a few observations in reply, and in support of the bill as a matter of economy. He was satisfied that an economical expenditure of the public money required that the structure should be removed; and he made various statements in detail, in support of that opinion.

Mr. LINCOLN alluded to the painful nature of the duty imposed upon the committee, which resulted injuriously to the reputation of Mr. Mills, as an architect, as he had long had a personal regard for him, and had on more occasions than one, advocated his employment by the Government. He said the committee had not from their own observation, discovered the want of strength in the building; but if they had not been apprised of that fault, the report would have been precisely what it is now; because there were other faults sufficient to induce its condemnation. There were not sufficient rooms now to accommodate the present wants of the Department. The basement rooms were declared to be uninhabitable for clerks, and without them, there were not rooms enough.

Mr. L. then went into an examination of details in relation to the present structure and its defects, and into minute comments and descriptions of other plans proposed for the completion of the work without removing the portion already erected. He condemned some of these plans as imperfect and incongruous, and the others would be too expensive, in addition to the imperfect and unsafe construction of the portion now in progress. Mr. L. made some comments upon the conduct of Mr. Mills during the investigation, and referred to the opinions of several distinguished architects; which all concurred that the design was bad and the construction insufficient.

The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the CHAIR announced that fact, saying that it was no longer competent for the committee to sit.

Some conversation ensued upon the order of business; during which,

Mr. LINCOLN said he asked no favors of the committee or the House in regard to the continuation of his remarks. He did not speak for his own satisfaction upon this painful subject, but in the discharge of his public duty; and when the indication of the House was that he had said enough, he should stop.

The committee rose and reported progress, till the time limited by the assignment.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the House suspended the rules and went again into committee for the remainder of the day.

The debate was continued by Messrs. LINCOLN, CUSHING and HOWARD, for a short time.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and decided in the negative—ayes 44, noes 63, not a quorum.

It being thought that a quorum was in the committee, the question was again put, and decided in the negative—ayes 59, noes 66.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. LINCOLN, which was adopted without a division.

Mr. RENCHER then moved an amendment, providing for the erection of a plain, brick, fireproof building, and appropriating fifty thousand dollars, in addition to former unexpended appropriations, for the construction of the same, near the State Department, and to correspond with the other buildings of the Departments.

Mr. R. made some observations in support of his amendment, which was further debated by Mr. MERCER, Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio.

Mr. LINCOLN moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words unexpended balance.

Mr. RENCHER assented to the modification.

Mr. EVERETT expressed his concurrence in the amendment as modified.

Mr. DUNCAN said he would go for the amendment, but when the bill came to the House he would go for striking out the first section, or postponing it for ever.

The amendment was then adopted; and the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to lay the bill on the table, and moved a call of the House; which was accordingly ordered.

After proceeding some time in the call, the further proceedings, on motion, were dispensed with.

The bill and amendments were then taken up, and the question being on laying the bill on the table—

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 82.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the last term of the Circuit Court of the United States for the State of Louisiana, and into the conduct of the United States District Judge of the said State, in attempting to remove the Clerk of the said District and Circuit Courts, without sufficient cause.

Mr. J. in offering the resolution, explained the serious causes of complaint which had existed in Louisiana for years with regard to the operations of the judicial system of the United States in that State. He stated that no business had yet been disposed of in the circuit court for that State; that the last term of the court had not been held, in consequence of an arbitrary attempt of the district judge to remove the clerk of the district and circuit courts without cause. He had been informed from the most respectable sources, that the clerk produced a letter from the district judge, stating that "he had performed the duties of his office faithfully, promptly, and uprightly, and to the entire satisfaction of the bench, the bar, and the public; and that the only reason he had for removing him was a desire to appoint an intimate friend in his place." On opening the circuit court, Judge McKinley, of the Supreme Court, after the argument of council, gave an opinion that the district judge did not possess the power to remove the clerk without cause. Judge Lawrence, still maintaining his right so to act, the question, it is understood, will be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States for final decision. In the mean time, neither the district nor circuit court of said State can be held for the want of a clerk. Consequently, the important business pending in the said courts will be suspended for a further period of, perhaps, twelve or eighteen months, and even for a much longer time, if the case should not be decided at the next term of the Supreme Court of the United States. Thus the mass of business in both courts is to be postponed, and the interests of the people sacrificed, because the district judge wishes to remove a clerk, who is eminently qualified for the situation, and against whom he had no cause of complaint, with the view of bestowing the office on an intimate friend.

Mr. J. concluded by remarking that, if the facts to which he had referred are true, of which he had no doubt, he, as one of the representatives from the State of Louisiana, had no hesitation in saying that, in his opinion, the district judge should be impeached and dismissed from office.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting the claims of the Marshal of the Northern District of New York for repressing frontier disturbances, and recommending the passage of a general measure to meet all similar cases; which, having been read, was,

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

At 5 o'clock, p. m. on motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Mr. SWIFT presented the petition of Harriet Livermore, praying remuneration for property lost among the Northwest Indians: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the southern boundary line of the Territory of Wisconsin to be run and marked, reported the same with an amendment to the amendment; and

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House, as amended by the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 31st ult. directing the committee to take into consideration certain provisions of the Deposit act of 1836, and to report thereon, made a report, which was read.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, made the following report:

The Committee on Finance, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 31st ultimo, directing certain inquiries as to various provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," passed on the 23d day of June, 1836, respectfully report:

The resolution instructs the committee "to take into consideration the act of the 23d of June, 1836, entitled 'An act to regulate the deposites of the public money,' and to make inquiry upon these points, viz:

First. "Whether, according to the provisions of that act, it is now competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to employ any bank which has heretofore been selected as a public depository, and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments."

The committee have examined the act with attention, and find that, all other objections being obviated, it is competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to employ, as a public depository, any bank which has heretofore been selected for that service, "and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments." The eighth section of the deposite act prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from discontinuing any deposite bank, and from withdrawing the public money therefrom, except for certain enumerated causes, one of which is in the following words:

"Or if any of said banks shall, at any time, refuse to pay its own notes in specie, if demanded."

Upon this cause being presented, it is made the express duty of the Secretary, by the same section of the act, "to discontinue any such bank as a depository, and withdraw from it the public moneys which it may hold on deposite at the time of such discontinuance;" but when the bank shall have again resumed specie payments, nothing is found in this language to interdict its re-selection as a public depository.

The fourth section of the act sets out the terms and conditions upon which the banks shall agree to receive the public moneys before they shall be employed as depositories. The second of these terms is prescribed in the following words:

"Secondly. To credit as specie all sums deposited therein to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and to pay all checks, warrants, or drafts, drawn on such deposites, in specie, if required by the holder thereof."

The breach of this condition, on the part of the bank, would be a refusal to pay its depositors in specie, and consequently a suspension, to that extent, of specie payments; and the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue it, as a depository, and to withdraw the public money from it, would become imperative, by the language of the eighth section, before referred to, which assigns, as another cause of discontinuance and withdrawal, that, "at any time any one of said banks shall fail or refuse to perform any of said duties, as prescribed by this act, and stipulated to be performed by its contract."

This contingency, therefore, like the former, would take from the bank its character as a depository, for the time being; would forfeit the existing contract, and render its discontinuance, and the withdrawal of the public money from it, an imperious duty; but the committee see nothing, in either of the causes, to prevent a second contract with the same bank, when it should again resume specie payments, again consent "to pay its own notes in specie, if demanded," and again "pay all checks, warrants, or drafts, drawn on the public deposites, in specie, if required by the holder thereof." They find no provision, in any other part of the act, interdicting a second contract with the same bank, when the first shall have been terminated for either of these causes, and they therefore express their opinion that "it is now competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to employ any bank which has heretofore been selected as a public depository, and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments;" there being no other obstacle, in the way of such second employment, than the act of suspension of specie payments.

The next point to which the resolution directs the inquiry of the committee, is in the following words:

Second. "Or which has, since the fourth day of July, 1836, paid out notes, or bills, of a less denomination than five dollars."

To cause the inquiry to be clearly understood, it is necessary to connect the preceding language with the words above quoted, and the inquiry will be, whether, according to the provisions of that act, [the deposite law of 1836,] it is now competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to employ any bank which has; since the fourth day of July, 1836, paid out notes, or bills, of a less denomination than five dollars.

In answer to this inquiry, the committee find the two first clauses of the fifth section of the act to be in the following words:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be selected, or continued, as a place of deposite of the public money, which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie; nor shall any bank be selected, or continued, as aforesaid, which shall, after the fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue, or pay out, any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

The last of these clauses meets and answers the inquiry directly, and shows that it is not competent for the Secretary of the Treasury, under this act, now to employ, as a public depository, any bank which has, since the fourth day of July, 1836, either issued, or paid out, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars; while the first clause interdicts the selection or continuance, at any time, and under any circumstances, of any bank "which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie."

These two points of the inquiry seem to the committee to assume the expediency of a course of legislation which shall revive and introduce again into practice the deposite system established by the act of 1836, as the system upon which the public money is to be kept and disbursed. Under this supposition, the opinion of the committee, as to the first inquiry, does not indicate the necessity of further legislation; while the plain and unquestioned construction of the act, as to the second, compels an answer which, to the minds of those who desire the reintroduction of that system, may seem to point out such a necessity.

Not so with the majority of the committee. While left by the Senate to the free exercise of their own opinions, they cannot recommend any legislation, the effect of which will be to reunite the public Treasury and the banks, by a return of the public treasure to the uses of banking; to stimulate and compel the banks to discount upon the public money, by exacting from them an interest for its use; to promote an expansion in the paper issues of the banks, exactly proportioned to the fertility of the public revenues, and a correspondent embarrassment of the public Treasury, when a sterility of revenue shall call for the public money which has passed into the hands of the customers of the banks. Such, they believe, have been the effects of the system of deposites, the revival of which the resolution seems to contemplate. That system compelled the deposite of all the public money in banks; it placed it in those institutions upon general deposite, and thus made it, in fact and in law, the money of the banks, and not the money of the people; it not only held out an inducement to the banks to use the money for the purposes of discount and banking, but, in this way, gave them the right so to use it, in defiance of the popular will, and of the public authorities; it went further, and compelled them to convert it to some profitable employment, by demanding interest from them while it was in their keeping. Time and experience have shown the consequences of such a policy, and, were there no other reason, these consequences would forbid the committee from recommending any legislation calculated, or intended, to revive that system.

The action of the Senate, however, appears to them equally to stand in the way of any such recommendation. A special convocation of Congress, in September last, was a necessity imposed by the failure of this system of deposites, and the embarrassments to the public Treasury thereby occasioned. Recommendations for the keeping and management of the public money, without the aid of the banks, and especially for a permanent separation between the treasure of the people and the business of banking, were then laid before Congress by the President. These recommendations were deliberately and definitively acted upon and adopted by the Senate, but failed to receive the assent of the other branch of Congress. At the commencement of the present session, the same recommendations, substantially, were renewed, and again the Senate has, after long deliberation and debate, adopted them, in the shape of a bill, and thus sent them to the House for its concurrence. If that bill shall become a law, the whole deposite system recognised and legalized by the deposite act of 1836, will be superseded. Will the Senate, then, by its own action, supersede its own bill? Will it, in the absence of all information as to what may be the fate of that measure in the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, or rather with the knowledge that it has not yet been considered there, send another bill upon the same general subject, based upon adverse principles?

The committee can only repeat, what they have found it to be their duty to say upon a kindred branch of this subject, that whether such duplicate action, by the same legislative body, be consistent wit established parliamentary law, with the economy of legislation, or with the uniformity of decisions which should characterize all deliberative bodies, are questions which properly address themselves to the Senate and not to them; but upon the m rits of the propositions they must be permitted to feel entire confidence that no sufficient reasons for a change of opinion or action can be presented.

The remaining inquiry embraced in the resolution is in the following words:

"Third. And also to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying those provisions of the said act, which prohibit the receipt, in payment of debts and dues to the United States, of the bills of all banks which issue bills of less denomination than five dollars."

This inquiry relates to the last clause of the 5th section of the act, which reads as follows:

"Nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States, which shall, after the said fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

This provision of the law of 1836, was inserted in furtherance of a policy some years since adopted by Congress, as will be seen by the 8th section of the proposed recharter of the Bank of the United States of the year of 1832, which reserved to Congress the power, from and after the 3d of March, 1836, to prohibit that institution from issuing or circulating notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars. That act did not become a law, but this feature of it met the approbation of the two Houses of Congress, while the objections of the then President to the bill made no mention of this provision as exceptionable in his mind. On the contrary, his whole policy, and all his recommendations in relation to the currency, after that date, and especially after the time when the power could have been exercised, favored the policy of this limitation. Various legislation of Congress in the year 1836, distinctly indicated a determination to adhere to, and carry out the policy, and by limiting the circulation of bank notes of the smaller denominations, to secure a currency of coin only for the minor transactions of business, for the payment of day laborers, for the change required in pecuniary dealings and the like; and in this way, also to give a more broad metallic basis to our whole paper circulation. Many of the States of the Union fell into the policy thus adopted and pursued by this Government, and conformed their legislation to the object proposed. It seemed to be universally conceded that these two objects could only be secured by the exclusion of small bank notes from ordinary circulation; and all adopted the policy as wise, and worthy of pursuit. The powers of this Government could effect little, as the paper circulation to be suppressed was that of the notes of banks existing by, and acting under State authority; but what it could do, was proposed to be done by the provision of the deposite law above quoted. As a more direct, and much more efficient movement, a very general and vigorous effort was made by the States and the people, to exclude from circulation bank notes of a less denomination than five dollars; and several States, whose banks had, theretofore, been authorized to issue notes of the denominations of one, two, and three dollars, took from them that authority, while the banks of several other States had either never possessed that authority, or had been deprived of it at a previous period. The progress in this attempted reform of the currency was materially retarded by the fact that all the States did not enter into, and act upon it, so as to restrain the issues of small notes by their banks, and that the banks of the British provinces upon our northwestern boundary continued to issue small notes, which found a more or less extended circulation in the contiguous States of the Union. Still the advance towards an entire metallic circulation for all sums below five dollars was as rapid as, in the then situation of the country and the banks, could reasonably have been expected; and additional States were taking measures for the gradual exclusion of the small notes of their banks, when the suspension of specie payments, with very few exceptions, by all the banks of all the States, in May, 1837, arrested the salutary improvement.

The suspension was, to every practical extent, perfect. The banks, as a general rule, did not pay specie upon any denomination of their notes, or to any class of their creditors. An unavoidable consequence followed. All the coin in circulation, the most of which had been put in circulation by the policy and measures before adverted to, was either gathered into the banks, not to be again given out for the circulating currency of the country, or was hoarded by private holders, to whose minds the suspension had communicated a feeling allied to panic, inclining them to treasure up all they had which was money, precisely in proportion to the diminution of their confidence in the value of that circulating medium which had, theretofore, represented money, but could not do so during the continuance of the entire suspension of specie payments by the banks. Hence either an absence of any medium for business transactions under five dollars, or the worst of all media which an enlightened public feeling could tolerate, soon became, in many sections of the Union, an evil of the first magnitude, and one against which the interference of the State Legislatures was commandingly invoked. In obedience to calls of this description from a suffering constituency, the Legislatures of several of the States, which had adopted and prosecuted the policy of substituting the circulation of coin for that of small bank notes in the minor pecuniary transactions of society, felt it to be their duty to retrograde in their action, and again to confer upon their banking institutions the power to issue, and the right to circulate, notes of the denominations below five dollars. In some cases this change of policy, in the action of the States, has been made general and unlimited; while in others, as the committee think more wisely and fortunately, it has been made temporary, and adopted with an evident design, not to abandon the policy, but to meet the particular grievance, and, that being obviated, to return to those sound measures which, as permanent regulations of law, cannot fail to have a most salutary influence upon our currency generally, and especially upon the interest of the poorer, and by far the most numerous classes, in its soundness and reality.

Still the committee suppose that nearly all the banks in many entire States have, in obedience to, and in conformity with, this change of policy in the legislative action of the States under whose authority they exist, violated the restriction imposed by the clause of the Deposite law of 1836 last above quoted, and thus put it out of the power of the fiscal officers of this Government to receive any of their notes in any payment to the United States while that restriction remains in force, and without modification. Under such circumstances, the committee are not prepared to say that this provision should be so rigidly adhered to as to perpetuate the exclusion of the notes of these banks from the public receipts, while the notes of other banks, no more safe, are received. Such a rule would not aid the policy which the committee earnestly advocate of giving greater stability to our paper circulation, but would merely establish an invidious discrimination between the different local banking institutions, founded, so far as they can discover, upon no defensible principle. Had these violations of the restriction imposed by the Deposite law been entirely voluntary on the part of the banks; had no suspension of specie payments, and no consequent derangement of the whole paper currency, intervened; and, even under these pressing inducements, had not the interference of the Legislatures of the States authorized the violations, and, in some cases, at least, rendered the issue of the small notes almost, if not altogether, a duty in the estimation of the surrounding community, the committee would be the last persons to suggest even, much less to recommend, the remission of the penalty which this law of Congress imposes upon the act.

After what has been said, it will not be expected that the committee will yield to "the expediency of repealing those provisions of the said act which prohibit the receipt in payment of debts and dues to the United States of the bills of all banks which issue bills of less denomination than five dollars." This would be to yield the sound and salutary policy which the provisions were designed to carry out; one of the last things, in the administration of the affairs of this Government, which the committee are disposed to surrender. While the benefits of a sound and stable currency are so loudly demanded by all parties and all interests, and while the committee know and feel that a greater infusion of coin into the circulating medium of the country is the safest mode of reaching that great and good result, they cannot become parties, much less agents, in a course of legislation which shall surrender the first step towards a consummation so ardently desired by all. They, therefore, give their opinion against a repeal of this provision.

It remains to consider what modification can properly be adopted to meet the case, and not weaken the great principle contended for. That, in the opinion of the committee, is a proposition of easy solution. The legislation of several of the States, to which reference has been made, furnishes a precedent which Congress can safely follow. A postponement, so far, of the operative limitation of the provision, as to relieve the banks from the exclusion caused by former violations; the fixing of another day, beyond which, if they shall again cease to issue notes below the denomination of five dollars, their notes may be received in payment of the public dues, will effectually cure the evil complained of; place the excluded banks, so far as the legislation of Congress is concerned, upon the same footing with their neighbor institutions, and preserve the policy of the law, in no other respect impaired than as to the time when that policy shall become practice.

The committee cannot, in justice to their own feelings, fail here to notice that many of the excluded banks have been among the first in the country to resume specie payments; that their issue of notes under the denomination of five dollars was a measure believed, not by those interested in the banks simply, but by the community within which they are located, to be in direct aid of a speedy resumption by the institutions which made the issues; and that the effect of those issues, under the circumstances of the case, and in the then condition of the currency, is still thought to have been salutary upon all interests, public and private. These are circumstances, which as it seems to the committeee, cannot escape the attention of Congress in deciding upon the propriety of the suggested modification of this provision of the deposite law of 1836.

Still the question is one connecting itself with the general subject of legislation, covered by the bill upon which, as has been before remarked, the Senate has acted, during its present session, and which bill has been, long since, sent to the House of Representatives for the concurrence of that body. When that bill shall be acted upon, the committee believe that an amendment, to the effect they have suggested, will be proper and expedient; and as they have abundant evidence that the attention of that body has been repeatedly and expressly called to this particular point, they have no reason to doubt that it will receive the required modification there, in case the judgment of the House, upon the propriety of its adoption, shall agree with that which the committee entertain and express.

They believe it, therefore, inexpedient that any independent proposition to accomplish this object should, at the present time, be originated in, or acted upon by, the Senate. Should the bill referred to be rejected by the House, or should it be returned to the Senate without the amendment suggested, in either case the modification may be originated and passed as an independent bill, without material consumption of time, in relation to the business of this body, while its adoption by the other, in the manner here suggested, will save the time and forms of independent legislative action. For these reasons the committee return the resolution to the Senate, without any proposition for the present action of the body upon any one of its suggestions.

After a debate, in which Messrs. WEBSTER, NORVELL, WRIGHT, and BENTON, took part, the report was ordered to be printed.

The Senate then took up the bill making appropriations to prevent and suppress Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for 1837; when,

Mr. BENTON addressed the Senate at length, in favor of the bill, and in reply to Messrs. SOUTHARD and PRENTISS's remarks of yesterday.

Mr. PRESTON followed in reply; and

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed without a division.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Jourdon, deceased, was then taken up, and opposed by Mr. ALLAN of Vermont (on whose call the yeas and nays on it were ordered,) and Mr. HALL, and supported by Mr. CRAIG, when the question was taken on it, and the bill was rejected—yeas 43, nays 110.

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Rignold Whit, alias Nick Hillary, was opposed by Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and supported by Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD and Mr. CRAIG, when the bill was rejected.

The bill for the relief of Josephine Nourse, was taken up like the foregoing, being on its third reading, and opposed by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, CUSHMAN, REED, CAMBRELENG, and TILLINGHAST, and supported by Messrs. HALSTEAD, MASON, BRIGGS, and CRAIG, when the bill was rejected.

[This bill involved a principle of much interest to persons in the military service of the United States. In favor of the bill it was argued, that Dr. Nourse was in the regular army of Florida, during a period when the army was deficient of surgeons; and in consequence of prevailing diseases, he was compelled to perform extraordinary duty. His exertions, united with the unhealthy condition of the climate and army, induced a disease of which he soon died. It was contended that the law provided for pensions to those who died of wounds received in the service in the regular army, and for pensions to those who died of diseases or wounds contracted in the service, provided they were volunteers or militia. The bill was opposed upon the ground that the law made a distinction between the army, and the militia or volunteers. The first enlisted voluntarily, to make arms a profession, under a contract of well known pay, perquisites, and advantages. The militia were subject to be compelled to leave their homes and their business, by drafts, against their will, to enter into the service; and volunteers were supposed, also, to act against their will in the profession of arms, under some emergency, such as should compel any and every man to defend his home and his country. The first went deliberately into the service, knowing the terms; the others were forced into it against their inclination and interest; and the distinction, whether founded in justice or not, had been made to compensate, in a more adequate degree, those who were forced to abandon their ordinary pursuits. It was further urged, that if the distinction was not properly made, the law in favor of the militia should be repealed, or the pension system for the regular army should be extended; and in case the latter course should be adopted, a pension should be given for all those who might die in the service of the United States, whether army, naval, or civil, for the principle would apply equally to all. The question rested upon this principle, and the additional consideration that special legislation should not be had upon such subjects which ought to be governed by general laws. If the general laws as they now exist are correct, and founded upon a just discrimination, this bill ought to be rejected; because, though a strong case, it ought not to be made an exception to the general rule. But if the law ought to be altered, it should be done by a general law, which would include this and all similar cases. The rejection of the bill shows the sense of the House, that these principles of the pension laws shall be maintained.]

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Nathaniel Tracy and Thomas Gordon, reported with an amendment, striking out the interest, which, after some remarks from Messrs. UNDERWOOD, McKENNAN, CUSHING, and POTTER, when—

Mr. ALLEN of Vermont moved to postpone it till Friday next.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to lay the bill on the table: lost.

After some further remarks from Messrs. ALLEN and UNDERWOOD,

Mr. LOOMIS moved to postpone the bill to Saturday next; which motion prevailed.

The bill for the relief of the representatives of Colonel Francis Vigo was taken up, and the question pending was upon the amendment of the committee, striking out the clause allowing interest.

After some explanation by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, PETRIKIN, POPE, CUSHMAN, MERCER, EWING, WHITE, ADAMS, PARMENTER and CAMBRELENG, the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken, and the vote was, ayes 86, noes 56.

So the amendment was concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read on Monday.

The bill for the relief of the representatives of William T. Smith was postponed to Saturday next.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Sumpter was postponed to Saturday next.

The bill for the relief of the representatives of Thomas Jett was postponed to Saturday next.

The bill for the relief of the representatives of James Madison, was postponed to Saturday next.

The bill for the relief of George Gibson, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of William Vawter, was next taken up, and the question was on concurring with the committee in their amendment striking out the enacting clause.

The question was discussed by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, ALLEN, MERCER, and CHAMBERS, after which it was taken, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 46, noes 19, not a quorum.

When upon motion of Mr. WISE, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, June 9, 1838.

Mr. PIERCE presented a petition from the Rhode Island State Temperance Society, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he rose to present some petitions, few in number, all relating to the same subject, and praying the establishment of a United States Bank. They profess, said Mr. C. to be from men of all parties; men who have felt the pressure in their business from the present deranged state of the currency, particularly at the South and Southwest, where a large portion of their trade was concentrated. Constituted as Congress now was, he felt how utterly unavailing would be all their prayers. One of these petitions was from certain friends of the Administration, that was, late friends of the Administration whose complexion was indicated by certain marks affixed to their names, which would enable any Senator interested to ascertain if the facts were as stated. He would only move that they be received, and laid on the table.

1. Resolved, That the power of designating the time, place and manner of elections for Representatives is expressly given by the Federal Constitution to the Legislatures of the States respectively, subject to no supervision or control, except by law of Congress only; and that, in the exercise of this power, the State Legislatures may constitutionally fix the time of election subsequent to the expiration of the Congress preceding that for which such election is to be holden.

2. Resolved, That neither the Federal or State Executive can constitutionally anticipate, supersede, or change the times of elections as fixed by the State Legislatures.

3. Resolved, That this House has not the constitutional power, either legislative or judicial, by its own action alone, to annul, suspend, or impede the operation of an act of a State Legislature, fixing the time, place, and manner of election for Representatives.

4. Resolved, That no election, or action of this House, can deprive the people of any State of their constitutional rights of electing representatives to Congress at the time designated for that purpose by the Legislature of such State; that the claim of such right on the part of this House would be a dangerous encroachment upon the rights of the States, and its exercise a direct and palpable violation of the Constitution.

5. Resolved, That the constitutional jurisdiction of this House over the subject of representation is a limited one, embracing the question of election, qualification, and return only; and in judging of election, this House is bound to judge in accordance with the act of the State Legislature regulating the time, place, and manner thereof.

6. Resolved, That in accordance with a constitutional act of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, prescribing the time, place and manner of election for Representatives to Congress, and in compliance with all the provisions of said act, an election was holden in November last for two Representatives from said State to the Twenty-fifth Congress, at which election S. S. Prentiss and Thos. J. Word were duly elected, possessed the constitutional qualifications, and were duly and legally returned.

7. Resolved, That the resolution of this House, adopted on the 5th day of February last, denying to said Prentiss and Word seats in this House as members thereof, was a dangerous attack upon the elective franchise, in derogation of the rights of the State of Mississippi, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and a mischievous example to future times.

Resolved, therefore, That said resolution be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

1. A bill granting an additional quantity of land for the location of revolutionary bounty land warrants.

2. A bill to enlarge the provisions of the act granting half-pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States in certain cases.

3. A bill to extend the pension law of 1832 to Western Indian fighters between the years 1783 and 1795.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he should object to making any more special orders.

Mr. CARTER moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RENCHER remarked that, as the bills were in Committee on the Union, a majority in committee could take them up at any time.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, also objected.

Mr. CARTER asked for the yeas and nays, which the House refused, as it did the motion to suspend: yeas 93, nays 53, not two-thirds.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported without amendment, Senate bill to reorganize the District Courts of the United States in the State of Mississippi; which, on Mr. T's motion, was ordered to a third reading, and then read the third time and passed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio asked leave to submit the following amendment to the rules and orders of the House:

"That no representative of this House shall be entitled to receive a per diem allowance for any day he shall not answer to his name on the first call of the names of the members, when a call of the House shall be ordered by a majority of the members present, unless he shall have been absent on the business of the House, and by its order or permission, or unless he shall have been detained by sickness, within the provisions of the second section of the act of January 22, 1818, allowing compensation to members of Congress and to the delegates of Territories, or unless he shall be excused by the House for not being present. And it shall be the duty of the Clerk to certify to the Speaker the names of all such absentees not within the excepted cases. And the Speaker shall not include a per diem allowance for such absent members not within the exceptions, for the day of such absence, in any draft he may draw, to enable such member to obtain his other pay.

Objection being made, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rule and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to lay the motion to suspend on the table.

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and thereupon Mr. HOPKINS, whose sole object had been, he said, to save time, withdrew the motion.

The House refused to suspend the rule; yeas 89, nays 98, not two-thirds.

Sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

WISCONSIN AND IOWA.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill to authorize the President of the United States to have the boundary line of Wisconsin ascertained and marked, (being to insert "Iowa" instead of "Wisconsin,") was concurred in.

The bill to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a canal to connect Rock river and Lake Michigan was read the third time and passed.

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

On motion of Mr. BOON, the House went into Committee on the Union, Mr. CRAIG in the chair; and Mr. B. moved to take up the pre-emption right bill.

Mr. SHIELDS moved to lay that bill aside, and take up the Tennessee land bill; but, after some conversation, he waived the motion at that time, giving notice of his intention to renew it as soon as the bill under consideration was disposed of.

The "bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands" was then resumed, the question pending being on the following amendment submitted by Mr. LINCOLN:

"Nor shall the benefit of this act extend to any person who has before availed himself of a pre-emption right to the entry of any of the public lands, and acquired a title thereto by reason of such entry."

Mr. RANDOLPH, who was entitled to the floor, opposed the bill at some length.

Mr. HARRISON supported it with much energy, and went thoroughly into an examination of the principles of the pre-emption system generally, and the necessity and equity of its present application, replying to the objections urged against it, and defending the character of the settlers from the aspersions cast upon them.

The bill was further debated by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, LINCOLN, POPE, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and LYON.

Mr. MASON of Ohio opposed the bill at length, and in the course of his remarks he appealed to Mr. CASEY of Illinois, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, to say whether any former President, in an annual message, had recommended a pre-emption law.

Mr. CASEY replied that no President had, in an annual message, recommended the passage of a pre-emption law, until the present Executive in his last message had done so. The late President, however, had repeatedly recommended that the price of the public lands be reduced, and that the means be made easy by which any actual settler on the public lands could be enabled to secure a home freehold and fireside of his own. It was scarcely necessary, perhaps, to add that Mr. C. was himself warmly in favor of both principles, that of pre-emption, and that of graduation, by which the rights of the United States were secured, and the best interests of a worthy class of citizens promoted.

Mr. CRARY followed at length upon the various topics connected with the bill; and when he had concluded,

The amendment offered by Mr. LINCOLN to the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD, was adopted by Mr. U.

Mr. MARTIN then obtained the floor, and expressed his wish to address the Committee; but as the hour was late, he would, if desirable, yield the floor for a motion to rise.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the committee rise; which motion was carried in the affirmative—ayes 70, noes 57.

The committee then rose and reported progress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, enclosing a report from the Colonel of Ordnance, in accordance with the act of Congress of April 2, 1794, in reference to armories; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State, showing the number and designation of the passengers who have arrived in each collection district of the United States, and in each quarter, during the year 1837, according to the returns made to the Secretary of State, pursuant to the act of March 2, 1819, regulating passengers, ships, and vessels; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion, the House adjourned.

ERRATA.—In the report of the Senate proceedings of Saturday last, Mr. TROTTER is represented to have made strenuous efforts to reconsider the vote relating to the indefinite postponement of the bill regulating the salaries of certain judges of the Circuit Courts of the United States. The true state of the case was, that a bill fixing the salaries of certain district judges of the United States was reported to the Senate by the Committee on the Judiciary some time since, which contained a provision for increasing the salary of the district judge of the State of Mississippi, (to wit, raising his salary to $2,500.) While the bill was before the Senate, in Committee of the Whole, a motion was successfully made to postpone the bill indefinitely. Mr. TROTTER, who was not in his seat at the precise moment the motion to postpone prevailed, endeavored to effect a reconsideration of that vote, which motion, so strenuously urged by Mr. T. was laid on the table, because it was feared that it would be likely to provoke discussion on the day which the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs had designed to go into Executive session. On another occasion, Mr. T. was erroneously made to move to place "the bill to authorize the State of Mississippi to invest the two per cent. fund due her" among the general orders; whereas Mr. T. moved to make it the special order for Wednesday next, which failed. These corrections are due as an act of justice to Mr. TROTTER, who has been thus inadvertently misrepresented in the report by one of the Reporters.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 12, 1838.

Mr. GRUNDY rose and remarked, that before the Senate proceeded to business, he wished to occupy a few minutes of its time He remarked that, when he reached the Senate chamber yesterday, the Senate was in secret session, and so continued until business required him to leave it late in the evening; so that this was the first opportunity presented to him of making a few remarks in relation to his colleague's speech, which appeared in the Intelligencer of yesterday, and had been made in the Senate on the 20th of April last. The most of that speech Mr. G. said he had heard, and had replied to at the time. He was satisfied with the reply and explanations as far as they went. The concluding remarks of his colleague he had not heard. They were afterwards imperfectly stated to him by two gentlemen who had a better opportunity of hearing. He had concluded to wait until the speech was published: he presumed it was truly reported; and he should now make that brief reply which he should then have made had he heard them. In doing this he should not be unmindful of what was due to himself, to the station he occupied, or to the place he was in.

He said he would answer that, so far as his colleague had thrown any personal imputations upon him, he threw them from him with all that disdain and scorn they merited; and he must assure his colleague that, he was sorry to say, the harsh, unqualified, and unfavorable opinion he had thought proper to express of him, (Mr. G.) was fully reciprocated, with a single qualification, which was that he hoped it was accompanied with less ill will and more cause.

He considered it fortunate that his colleague was not the judge upon whose opinions his (Mr. G.'s) standing, and welfare, in life depended. Were it so, he should much fear that what might reasonably be expected from his sense of justice would be entirely lost in the predominance of his prejudices and passions.

He regretted that he had been compelled to interrupt the business of the Senate for a moment, with any thing that related to himself. He could not have said less, and he had no desire to say more, unless he was placed under a like necessity; and in the event of such an occurrence, he should ask the indulgence of the Senate, and he trusted it would not be withheld.

After he took his seat—

Mr. WHITE replied in an animated manner, when

Mr. GRUNDY proceeded in like manner, and at considerable length, when he was called to order by the PRESIDENT of the Senate, who declared that the discussion must stop; and, there upon, Mr. G. inquired if he was required to take his seat. Upon being answered in the affirmative, Mr. G. said he obeyed; and afterwards—

Mr. WHITE was permitted to explain a circumstance in his own conduct; and then the Senate proceeded to business.

The CHAIR announced a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Colonel of the Ordnance Department, furnishing the information required by the act of 2d April, 1794; which was laid on the table.

The CHAIR also communicated a report from the Secretary of State, containing a statement of the number and designation of passengers in the vessels arriving in the ports of the United States during the past year, made in pursuance of the act of Congress of 2d March, 1809; which was laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY presented a petition from sundry citizens of Connecticut, praying for the establishment of a Bank of the United States.

While up, Mr. C. referred to a letter he had just received from a highly respectable gentleman, noticing some allegations made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] against the characters of the signers to the petition on the same subject, from New Haven, Connecticut, presented by him some days ago. The petition was signed by the Governor of the State, the Mayor of the city, six present and past presidents of banks, and as respectable a body of citizens as could be found any where in the United States. Mr. C. said he thought it due to the persons who chose him as the organ of presenting their communication to the Senate to speak in their behalf, and bear his testimony to their respectability; and he regretted that a sense of justice had not induced the Senator from Connecticut, upon looking at the signatures, and seeing who the petitioners were, to make the amende honorable, by withdrawing his imputations.

Mr. NILES denied that he made any allegations against the characters of the signers to the memorial referred to. On the contrary, he distinctly said, he presumed they were respectable. What he did say was, that their paper contained a statement that was incorrect in point of fact, and if this was a reflection he could not take it back, because he still entertained the same opinion. He only deplored, as he now did, that men of high standing and influence in society were so far regardless of what was due to themselves and to truth as to make a statement so much at war with facts. If he had done these petitioners injustice, he would certainly make the amende honorable; but he spoke guardedly; he did not speak as of his own knowledge, but under his convictions, founded on his acquaintance with the state of parties and of public sentiment in his State.

After some further remarks by Messrs. CLAY and NILES, the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial signed by sundry merchants of New Haven, Connecticut, and the resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Board of Commissioners of the associated banks of Boston, praying for the repeal of the provisions of the deposite act of 1836, which prevents the collectors from receiving in payment of the public dues the notes of any banks which issue and pay out notes of a less denomination than five dollars.

BANKS AND BANK NOTES.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a petition from merchants in the city of New Haven, Connecticut, (including all the importing merchants but one,) praying the repeal of that portion of the deposite act of 1836 which prohibits the receipt by the Government of the notes of banks which, since the passage of that act, had issued notes of a denomination less than five dollars.

Also, another paper of the same character, in the form of resolutions, from the Board of Commissioners of the Associated Banks of Boston and its vicinity, and asking the same relief. On presenting these petitions,

Mr. WEBSTER said: The present state of things is truly singular. An effort for a general resumption of specie payments by the banks is making, and about to be made, all over the country.

Some of the banks have resumed. But, now, sir, what is the attitude in which the Government stands?

By the new Specie Circular, it is proclaimed that specie or Treasury notes will be required, unless debtors to Government can procure notes of a specie-paying bank of the denomination of twenty dollars, or upwards; which bank shall not have issued, or paid out, any note under five dollars, since July, 1836. No postmaster may receive any note less than twenty dollars!

This refusing to receive notes under twenty dollars is doubtless founded on the provision in the act of April, 1836, that no disbursing officer shall offer in payment any note less than twenty dollars.

I cannot say I think this part of the circular absolutely necessary, so long as the deposite system exists; but, at the same time, the provisions of the act of April countenances this regulation in some degree, if not entirely.

But taking this state of law and this circular together, can it be said that Government is encouraging resumption of specie payments, or facilitating the restoration of things to a state of prosperity? Is there, in the spirit of these regulations, any thing to remind us of the course of Government, under similar circumstances, in the days of Mr. Dallas and Mr. Crawford?

In New England, as I believe, all the banks, with one or two exceptions, have issued or paid out small bills since July, 1836. If there be more than one or two exceptions, I have not heard of them.

In New York, the Legislature felt itself imperatively called upon to alter the law of the State, and authorize, at least for a time, the issue of small bills. The popular branch of the Legislature was nearly unanimous for an unqualified repeal. The Senate preferred a suspension, and a suspension was the final result.

It is admitted, I believe, on all hands, that this measure was called for by the people. It was not the result of any bank management, or of the operation of any private interests whatever. It was the result of a clear, loud, and irresistible demand of the public will. It cannot be charged to party, to management, or to any thing but a universal conviction that the measure would be useful, and was necessary. Its beneficial effects are not doubted, I believe, by any body, in aiding the banks in the great work of resumption. Now, I suppose that all the banks in New York, with, perhaps, two or three exceptions in the city, have availed themselves of this suspension law, and have issued small bills. Their notes, therefore, cannot be received at the custom-house, or the post office, or elsewhere, where debts to Government are to be paid. I suppose the same state of things exists in New Jersey, and many other States, both Atlantic and Western.

I have said on a former occasion, and I still think, that the measures pursued by Government have overthrown, at least for the present, its own policy of discontinuing the use of small bills. A state of things has arisen in which the people of States which had begun to act on that policy have compelled their Legislatures to give up the attempt for the present. In some instances, the laws against small notes have been repealed; in others, modified or suspended. All this, I repeat, has been the work of the people themselves, acting directly on their own Legislatures. Under existing circumstances, they find small bills useful, if not indispensable. And as there is no reason to doubt the solvency of the banks which issue such notes, more than that of others, the question may be asked, as it is asked, with significancy and effect by the committee of the associated banks in Boston, "why not put the notes of all specie-paying banks on the same ground?"

I think, sir, it is the duty of Government, at the present important moment, to extend a large and liberal confidence to the banks, and to encourage their efforts, and assist their struggles for resumption by all proper means. To this end, I think the prohibition contained in the fifth section of the deposite law ought to be repealed, or suspended for a considerable time, and until circumstances shall favor a renewed attempt to sustain the policy heretofore pursued. I am of opinion that it is not enough merely to abolish the incapacity, arising from what has been done, contrary to the provision of the statute. I think it necessary to provide that bank notes of specie-paying banks may hereafter be received, at least for some time, although the banks issuing them continue to issue small bills. Nothing short of this can give effectual relief. The banks cannot now, without great public inconvenience, again recall their small notes. The people will not consent that they should. This is a point, I believe, on which there is but little difference of opinion in those States in which small notes are issued.

On the whole, my opinion is, that the best thing to be done, under all circumstances, is to repeal the prohibition, and to wait for a more favorable opportunity to establish the policy which it was intended to sustain. I hope we may see our way on this subject somewhat clearer some time hence than we now see it. If a repeal, however, be objected to, a suspension is indispensably necessary; and this suspension should be for such a length of time as will enable the banks and the public to adjust their concerns to the state of things which will then be before them. But if a suspension only be agreed to, and a day fixed when it shall expire, and especially if that day be a near one, the banks will be compelled immediately to begin to call in their bills, and the relief afforded, if it be any relief at all, will be crippled and ineffectual. Another pressure will commence, and a renewal of past troubles ensue. My opinion is, therefore, that, taking all circumstances into consideration, it is best to repeal the prohibition, and retain, of course, the power of renewing it when a state of things shall hereafter arise to justify such renewal.

For the same reasons, I think the second section of the act of April should also be repealed.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] in a speech which he made upon the bill which (it was said) in effect repealed the late Specie Circular, observed that the Secretary of the Treasury could not issue any new Treasury order, without incurring censure. No matter what was its character, or what were its provisions, a future Treasury Circular would bring down upon its author the severest animadversions. How truly has the prophecy of the Senator become matter of history! The necessary, the proper action of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject of the currency, the kind of paper money which could be receivable for the public dues, calls forth the most determined opposition. He was utterly at a loss to know how the Secretary had made himself obnoxious to any merited censure, by reason of this new circular. The Secretary had done his duty; he had done nothing more. After the bill passed, doing away with all discrimination as to the kind of money receivable for Government dues, it certainly was a part of the public duty of the head of the Treasury Department to issue at once a circular to correspond with the existing state of things. The Specie Circular of July, 1836, was done away; and was the Secretary to make no order in relation to this subject? Would the exclusive collection of specie, under the act of 1789, for customs as well as for the sales of the public lands, been tolerated? And if the joint resolution of 1816 was to be carried into practice, could the Secretary have been silent? Would he have answered the expectations of the business community, if he had not issued some new circular, which would, in effect, secure to that community the benefit of the joint resolution of 1816? Was not that called for, after the recent resolution of Congress, repealing the Specie Circular of July, 1836?

And what are the provisions of this new circular, about which so much has been said here and elsewhere? He had carefully examined it; and when he first read it he compared it with the existing laws of the land, and he could not well conceive how the Secretary of the Treasury could have issued a different order, unless he had wholly disregarded the provisions of the acts of Congress, and unless he had intended to withhold from the community altogether the benefit of the joint resolution of 1816. The Deposite act of 1836 provides, in express terms, that the bills of no bank which shall have issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be received for the dues of the Government, for lands, or for customs. This is the law. And what is the circular? Is it any thing more or less than this? Not at all. If the Secretary, in his order to the collectors and receivers, had said that the bills (without any discrimination) of all banks shall be receivable for public dues, would he not have been charged, and most justly charged, with having violated the letter of the law of Congress? Could such an order have been justified upon any principle? It could not. The Secretary, then, in this part of the circular, had kept himself within the express terms of the Deposite act of July, 1836. His purpose most clearly was, after the recent legislation, to secure to the business community the practical benefits of the joint resolution of 1816. For this purpose, and with this view, he had issued this new circular; but in promulgating this new order he could not have been so faithless to his public duty as to have disregarded the existing laws of the land. He, therefore, in this respect, had made, and most properly made, this circular conform to the acts of Con gress. He had done nothing more, he could have done nothing less. So much for that part of the circular which prohibits collectors and receivers from taking the bills of banks issuing notes of a less denomination than five dollars.

The other part of the circular which prohibits the receipt of any bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, he thought was equally defensible. It had been admitted, if not, it would not be denied, that no notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars could now be offered in payment by the Government to its creditors. And not even that denomination of paper, unless it were equivalent to specie at the place where disbursed, and could be then converted into specie at the will of the holder. This was the law of the land. It was no contrivance of the Secretary of the Treasury; but a distinct and explicit statntory requisition. He remarked that the deposite act of 1836 was a dead letter so far as it related to most of the banks of the country.

In Massachusetts, and in the State he in part represented, there was not a single bank which could be selected as a public depository consistently with the provisions of the deposite act of July, 1836. They had incapacitated themselves from being employed as places of deposite of the public money. There was not one of them but what had paid out bills of a less denomination than five dollars since the suspension of specie payment. They had done this, he was free to admit, from necessity, and with regard to the public convenience. But in doing this, it could not be denied that they could not thereafter be selected as depositories of the public money. The deposite act, therefore, must have been regarded by the Secretary at the time of the issuing this new circular as, to a great extent, inoperative—certainly in his own State, as well as in every other State of New England—as if it had never been passed, so far as it related to the employment of the local banks as public depositories. This, he presumed, could not be controverted. He would then ask, what was the Secretary to do to prevent bank paper to be taken of a less denomination than the law authorized to be disbursed? Would he have been justified in directing the collectors and receivers to take notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars? He would ask if such had been the order, what would the receivers have done with this description of paper? It could not have been disbursed consistently with the existing provisions of law? If a paper of a less denomination than twenty dollars should be offered in payment by the agents of the Government to its public creditors, the practice could not fail to have received, as it has already received during the present session, the marked condemnation of those who oppose the Administration. Such a description of paper could not be placed on general deposite to the credit of the Treasurer, because under the deposite act of 1836 no State bank could be selected as a place of deposite. The only course left for the receivers, would have been to have converted such a description of paper at once into specie; and he was sure that no friend of the banks would say that such a practice would operate to their advantage, or would tend to promote their benefit.

The Secretary then in requiring of collectors and receivers not to take bank paper of a less denomination than twenty dollars, had acted with reference to the existing state of things, and with reference to the existing law of the land. He had authorized the receipt of that description of paper money, which alone could be disbursed. He well knew that the banks were no longer the fiscal agents of the Government. That the collectors of the customs, and the receivers at the land offices, were charged with the duty of receiving and disbursing the public money; and it seemed to him that there would be a most glaring absurdity in requiring these public officers to take what they could not disburse—to receive notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, when, by the express terms of the statute, no such paper money could be paid to any of the public creditors.

This then was the head and the front of the Secretary's offence. That by reason of the recent legislation of Congress, and to secure to the community the benefits of the joint resolution of 1816, he had issued a general order to collectors and receivers to take that description of paper, and that only, justified by existing law; and the notes of those banks, and of those banks only, which the deposite act of 1836 permitted. He had done what the law authorized, and what it seemed the law required him to do; he had done nothing more; and if there was cause of offence, it was not to be traced to that act of the Secretary of the Treasury, but to the positive enactments of Congress.

He wished to say a word or two upon the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. He could not believe that a majority of either House of Congress would be found to legalize the receipt of bills of a less denomination than five dollars for the public dues. Such a proposition could find no favor with him; and he should be slow to believe that Congress would, by its own legislation, expel from circulation the specie which the existing policy of the Government was well calculated to keep in circulation. He believed that the Legislature of his own State, and the Legislatures of all the New England States, would ere long prohibit the banks from issuing bills of a less denomination than five dollars. It was, in his judgment, greatly to be desired. The direct effect of such legislation would be to introduce at once specie into circulation for that description of paper. The consequence of such an improvement in the circulating medium would be most sensibly felt by the laboring classes of the community—a portion of our citizens more likely to be injured than any other, and much less able to bear loss than any other, by a depreciated paper currency. He hoped, therefore, as a matter of great public convenience, that Congress, as well as the State Legislatures, would, by their public acts, increase the specie and diminish the paper circulation. In no way could this be done more effectually than to carry out the policy of the deposite act of 1836. The papers presented this morning by the Senator from Massachusetts look to a departure from that policy. All he would say was, that he was wholly opposed to the object avowed. Nor was he of the opinion that there was any great inconvenience experienced or felt in Boston by the importing merchants as things now existed. He had read in one of the public journals of that city—a journal not in favor of the present Administration—and he had received letters from that city; and he could not believe, relying on these sources of information, that there was much practical embarrassment produced among the mercantile community in consequence of the act of July, 1836, and of the recent Treasury Order prohibiting the receipt for customs of the notes of banks which had issued bills of a less denomination than five dollars. The Merchants' Banks had long since resumed specie payments. He believed that two or three other banks had, also, by a vote of their boards of directors, resumed specie payments for their liabilities; and, although the Merchants' Bank could not, under the deposite act of 1836, be selected as a depository of the public money, having paid out the notes of other corporations of a less denomination than five dollars, yet that bank had not issued, since the passage of the deposite act of 1836, its own bills of a less denomination than five dollars. The notes, therefore, of that bank were receivable for public dues; and, since its resumption of specie payments, he believed that more than two hundred thousand dollars had actually been paid into the Custom House for duties of the bills of that institution. He was advised, and verily believed, that every possible accommodation was afforded to the mercantile community by that institution. He, therefore, was not aware of any special inconvenience that was felt by the mercantile community by reason of the prohibitions mentioned in the act of July, 1836, and he certainly could not agree to any change of the policy as manifested by that statute. In his own State there were twenty-seven banks—all, with the exception of two, had issued, and still continued to issue, their own notes of a less denomination than five dollars; and those two had paid, in the course of their business, other bank paper of a less denomination than five dollars. The two banks to which he referred—one at Portsmouth, the other at Concord—had not issued their own paper of a less denomination than five dollars, and there could be no doubt that the bills of the Commercial Bank at Portsmouth, and of the Mechanics Bank at Concord, if he was not mistaken as to their course, would be received for the Government dues; and it was equally clear that the bills of all the other banks could not be received, without an entire departure from the act of July 1836. They had not been received at any time since the passage of that act, and they would not be hereafter received, because they would not desist from issuing bills of a small denomination. It was more for their interest to pursue this course than to have their paper received for Government dues. And so it was with a great proportion of the banks of Massachusetts. But while he was wholly opposed to any material change of the provisions of the act of 1836, he would have no objection to placing all the banks upon the same ground. He would say to them all, if hereafter you will cease to issue or to pay out bills of a less denomination than five dollars, he would agree to receive their paper for customs and for lands. Beyond this he would not go. Beyond this, with a view to the practical convenience of the importing merchants, he did not believe it was necessary to go. He hoped, therefore, that the future legislation of Congress, in relation to this matter, would be so directed, as to add to, not diminish, the specie circulation of the country.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that it could not be denied that, under the operation of existing laws, there was now a total disconnection between the Government and the banks, even if they resumed specie payments. The separation was complete and entire, so far as that the Government could not employ any banking institutions which have issued notes under five dollars; and this fact ought to be known to the country and to Congress, because the banks themselves had produced the separation, even in case they resume. There might be a few solitary exceptions; but he had heard of no bank in the country, with the exception of those of Missouri and Arkansas, which had not either issued small notes of its own, or paid out those issued by other banks or corporations. None of the banks of Pennsylvania had issued notes of less than five dollars, but they had generally paid out notes issued by other corporations, and therefore, by the deposite act, they became disqualified as public depositories.

[Mr. PRESTON here interrupted Mr. B. to say that none of the banks of South Carolina had issued or paid out notes under five dollars.]

Mr. BUCHANAN resumed. The question now was as to renewing the connection between the Government and the banks. He did not think he should vote for a bill to renew the connection. There was another question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts, and that was relative to the difference between banks which have issued notes under five dollars, and those which have only paid out such notes issued by others. He did not think there was any difference in point of morality or propriety. Mr. B. said he never would agree to repeal the provision referred to entirely; but, for the sake of giving the banks time to resume, he would be willing to suspend its operation for a time—say to the 6th of October next.

Mr. WEBSTER believed that the interdiction after the 6th October next would be the most pernicious measure that could be adopted in the event of a resumption.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he rose simply to correct a statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the banks of all the States, except Missouri and Arkansas, received or paid out notes of a less denomination than five dollars. He believed the remark was incorrect, so far as the banks of the State of Indiana were concerned. Those banks are not authorized by their charters to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and the law of the State prohibits the issue or circulation of small notes under a penalty. He had heard of no instance in which the banks of Indiana had laid themselves liable to be placed under the restriction of the recent circular, whenever they shall resume specie payments, nor did he believe such to be the fact. So far, therefore, as Indiana was concerned, the repeal of the late circular would operate most favorably, he had no doubt. But still he was satisfied that the new circular had manifested that justice to the other States required that the restriction should be repealed, at least so far as to authorize the receipt of the notes of all specie-paying banks that shall not, after a given time, issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars. He felt, as at present advised, disposed to go that far; but he had yet to be satisfied that it would be good policy to encourage the issue of notes of a less denomination than five dollars; he would, however, not anticipate the argument on that question.

Mr. BUCHANAN was glad to hear what the Senator from Indiana had stated in regard to the banks of his State. Then there were three States in the Union, Indiana, Missouri, and Arkansas, where the banks had not taken the advantage of the suspension to give out small notes.

Mr. STRANGE hoped the Senator from Pennsylvania would allow him to correct him, so far as the banks of North Carolina were concerned. The banks of his State had never issued shinplasters at all; and their lowest issues were in notes of three dollars.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator from North Carolina need not have risen to correct him, as the issue of notes of three dollars by the banks of his State, disqualified them, under the deposite law. Mr. B. believed that the banks were generally able to resume, and dispense with the issue of small notes, and that all they wanted was a little time. There might be some who would prefer the profits and advantages derived from the issue of small notes to the receivability of their notes by the Government; but he believed that the large and respectable institutions would find it to their interest to dispense with the issue of such notes. He would not say any more on this subject, till the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts came in.

Mr. BENTON said he might be mistaken; but he was strongly under the impression that the banks of Massachusetts had lost no privilege by the restriction in the deposite law of 1836. If he was right, these banks had never earned the privilege of having their notes taken by the Government, by suppressing their small notes, with the exception, perhaps, of one or two banks in Boston. If this was the fact, what right had these banks to come forward now, and ask of Congress, not only a remission of the penalty, but to encourage them in issuing small notes. Why, if there never had been a suspension of specie payments, their condition would be the same. The Senate and country must observe the change of issue now made. The suspension began in New York; and the reason given by these banks was, that they had been run upon. What was the reason given by the rest of the banks of the country? Why, they suspended solely because the banks of New York had set them the example, declaring that they would resume as soon as New York did; and one of them superadded the declaration, "that if it had consulted its own strength," it would have gone on. That was the state of the case.

Now the banks of New York resume; but a new set of banks had sprung up, presenting a change of issue, bottomed on an afterthought; which was, that they could not resume until the Federal Government would take their notes. It is nonsense, said Mr. B. for us to talk as if we did not understand that there is a class of banks which is political, contradistinguished from the class which is commercial. The political class inclines to take every opportunity to make mischief, while the commercial class is endeavoring in good faith to carry out the objects for which they were created. The subject must be treated as it is, and they must call things by their right names. He repeated, that the banks petitioning had lost no privilege; they had nothing to complain of, nothing to ask for. The movement now was, and they should not disguise it, to join the banks and the Government together again, after the separation had been made by the action of the banks. It was an attempt to join Bank and State together; and why should they not say so. Mr. B. here referred to the report of the Finance Committee, which, he said, had fully gone into and explained the whole subject. When the proper time came, Mr. B. said he should endeavor to give some reasons for the part he should take and the vote he should give; at present he would not go further into the subject.

After some further remarks from Mr. WEBSTER, the memorials were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER then, in pursuance of previous notice, asked leave to introduce the following:

A BILL making further provisions for the collection of the public revenues.

Be it enacted, &c. That the operation of so much of the act of June 23d, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," as prohibits the receipt of the notes or bills of specie paying banks, which have issued since the 4th of March, 1836, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars, be, and the same is hereby, suspended until further order of Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to select and employ as depositories of the public money, according to the provisions of said act, any banking institutions which may be established under the provisions of a law of the State in which it exists.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury hereafter to select and employ as depositories of the public money, according to the provisions of said act, any bank which shall redeem its notes and bills on demand in specie, notwithstanding it may have stopped specie payments since the date of the said act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the operation of the second section of the act of April 14, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836," be, and the same is hereby, suspended until further order of Congress.

Leave was granted, the bill was introduced, and read the first time, and, on the suggestion of Mr. WRIGHT that it would be of no use to refer it, a report just having been made on the whole subject from the Committee on Finance, the bill was laid on the table, with the understanding that it would receive its second reading and come under the consideration of the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the House to reorganize the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported several bills from the House, without amendment.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Pratt.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the Committee on Patents was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Ebenezer Watson and Walter R. Johnson.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Claims, reported without amendment, the bill for the relief of William Dixon.

Mr. R. moved that the same committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Hiram H. Lewis, and William E. Lewis, and of the representatives of John H. Pratt.

Mr. MERRICK asked leave to withdraw the papers of the executor of James Cook of Maryland, as they were required as evidence in a Court of Chancery.

This being counter to a resolution of the Senate, offered by Mr. HUBBARD, and recently adopted, a conversation of some length ensued on the question of order, chiefly by the VICE PRESIDENT, Mr. MERRICK, Mr. HUBBARD, and Mr. WEBSTER, which resulted in leave being granted to withdraw the papers; whereupon

Mr. HUBBARD offered a resolution, which lies over one day, making the resolution formerly offered by him, prohibiting the withdrawal of original papers on private claims, one of the standing rules of the Senate.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, JUNE 25, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 29.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

Mr. NORVELL, on leave, introduced a bill making certain grants of public lands, and for other purposes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SOUTHARD, on leave, introduced a bill to establish the office of surgeon general in the Navy, and to confirm certain claims to land in Louisiana, between the Red river and the Sabine, derived from Spanish grants, etc.; which were severally read twice, and referred.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of Simeon Moss, without amendment.

The bills from the House making temporary provisions for the comfort and support of the lunatics of the District of Columbia, and relating to the Orphan's Court of Alexandria county, in the District of Columbia, were severally read twice, and referred.

The bill to encourage the introduction, and promote the cultivation, of tropical plants in the United States, was read the third time; when

Mr. TIPTON called for the yeas and nays on the question. He went as far as he thought he ought to go in voting for the printing of so large a number of the copies of the Senator's report on the subject; and on reading this report since, he regretted that he had not at once risen, and raised his voice against the measure. He wished the yeas and nays to be taken to see what Senators would vote for making a grant to encourage a particular kind of industry; and if they introduced a precedent of this kind, they might hereafter be asked for a grant to his constituents to encourage them to cultivate the Red river cotton which would be so much more profitable than their present products. He was opposed to the whole process from first to last, and did not believe that Congress had a right to make a grant for such purposes. Mr. T. observed that this kind of encouragement to agricultural industry had been given before, and failed to effect its object; and instanced the sale, on a long credit, to certain French emigrants, of a large body of the finest lands in his State, to encourage the cultivation of the vine and the olive, and the late grant to certain Polish exiles, both of which had resulted in mere speculation.

Mr. MORRIS made some remarks in opposition to the bill, contending that Congress had no right to make a donation of the public lands for the encouragement of any species of industry.

Mr. LINN observed that this bill was just as defensible as the grants by the Government of the United States to the State of Ohio the National road, after expending a million of dollars on it, and certainly as defensible as the giving the public lands to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, for the purpose of opening a canal. Let the gentlemen from Indiana and Ohio turn their eyes to the bogs, mangrove thickets, and pestilential swamps of southern Florida, that no body would have, and that were so worthless, that one of our distinguished generals [Gen. Jesup] was for giving them up, and abandoning them to the wild Indians; and say whether he would not give them to the man who is willing to go upon them, and risk his life to improve them, and render the adjacent Government lands valuable, on condition that he succeeds in his undertaking. We all know said Mr. LINN the value of Doctor Perrine's services, and that he incurred many dangers and great hardships, and faithfully carried out the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, in collecting valuable seeds and plants, and that he was the only one of our foreign consuls who did. The bill was well guarded, and the memorialist could get no title, until he performed all the conditions required of him, in default of which he would forfeit the land. Doctor Perrine asked for nothing but the fens, bogs, and worthless swamps of Florida; and the bill excepted even the timber lands, town sites, and every thing that was valuable. Mr. L. could see nothing in the bill calculated to excite the apprehensions which gentlemen had thought proper to conjure up.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama had one objection to this proposition. It gave a bounty to a certain description of agricultural industry not given to others, and he was not aware there was any such power vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States. He recollected, some years ago, when the subject was agitated in Congress, that he was of the opinion that it was not in the power of Congress to give a bounty to encourage manufactures; and he should like to know how Senators, who entertained the same opinions, could support this bill. This proposition went far beyond any of the kind that ever had been passed by Congress. By the bill for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive, the French emigrants were to pay for the lands granted them, though they had a liberal credit. It was the same thing with the unfortunate bill for the benefit of the Polish exiles. But this bill did not propose that the grantees should pay one dollar. It was a perfect bounty to Doctor Perrine and his associates, and he saw no power in the Constitution to grant it.

Suppose a proposition came here from other citizens of the United States, for a new experiment, by which some great good was to be effected, by cultivating something else than tropical plants, would it not be as much entitled to a favorable consideration as this? The Senator from Missouri talked of the worthless character of the lands in southern Florida—the pestilential swamps, mangrove thickets, etc. of which he [Mr. C.] had no certain information—but this land had not yet been surveyed; and therefore the quality of all this land could not be known with any certainty; so that, for aught he knew, the grantees might select a township valuable enough for the cultivation of Sea Island cotton. Mr. C. was not willing to place on the statute book a principle of this kind, so entirely indefensible by any thing to be found in the Constitution, or any where else.

Mr. SEVIER was somewhat astonished at the zeal displayed by his friends on the right and left [Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, and MORRIS] against this bill. These gentlemen talked about Constitutional objections, and seemed to be frightened at something new. Why the principle, Mr. S. said, was as old as the Government itself. In Louisiana the Government had made donations without number, and so, also, in all the other new States, and this too without the slightest obstacle to be found in the Constitution. What did that instrument say? Why, "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory and other property of the United States." Dispose of it how? Why, as Congress pleased. We have exercised the power, said Mr. S. of disposing of the public domain as we pleased, in one unbroken series of precedents from the formation of the Government to this time; and we have granted it to citizens of the States, to corporate institutions, and for county sites.

The object of this bill was highly meritorious. It gave a township of worthless land to an individual who was willing to risk his life in opening new sources of agricultural industry, and thereby promoting the agricultural interests of the country, and bringing into market lands that have hitherto been deemed worthless and uninhabitable. He was glad to see that the Agricultural Committee, which had hitherto been so much out of view, had come forward with so interesting a report, and this circumstance augured favorably for the prosperity of his favorite interest. He confessed he would have liked the bill better if the township granted was to be given out a section at a time, as it was reclaimed and brought into cultivation, but he was gratified to vote for the bill as it was. The grant, however, was not without some consideration, and a valuable one, for it was all important to encourage the settlement of a white population in a region that was now the hiding place of the wild Indian. The expense of the very medicine consumed by our soldiers, who were employed in the sickly swamps of Florida, would amount to infinitely more than the real value of the township that was to be granted.

Mr. LINN returned his thanks to his excellent friend from Arkansas, for the able manner in which he had come to the rescue. But his friend was mistaken in one thing. His objection was already provided against in the bill. By it Doctor Perrine would not get a patent for an acre, till he satisfied the Government that he had settled on it, and got it in cultivation. The reason why Doctor Perrine wanted the whole township now was, because it might be ten or fifteen years before the Government would think it worth while to survey such valueless lands. Mr. L. here stated the services of Doctor Perrine, and the trouble and difficulties he encountered in procuring valuable seeds and plants; and there never was, in his opinion, a more meritorious claim than that now presented to the consideration of Congress. What was the return to be made him, and what did the bill propose to give him? Why, fens and bogs, and mangrove thickets, that every body who knew any thing about it said were utterly worthless. There was no ignorance on the subject: geography, history, and every thing else tells you that Southern Florida is nothing but pestilential swamps and impenetrable thickets, infested by every species of noxious reptile and wild beast. If gentlemen entertained such strong constitutional objections, why did they not urge them yesterday, when the bill was susceptible of amendment? They might have required payment of the lands, and have asked twenty-five cents an acre, or some small consideration, to prevent the grant from being an absolute donation; but to attack the bill now, when it could not be amended, was something like a purpose to destroy it. As his friend from Arkansas observed, it was but lately that the agricultural interest had any attention paid to it in either House of Congress; and it would not be his fault if more attention was not paid to it in future.

Mr. NILES made some remarks in opposition to the bill in its present shape; when

Mr KING wished to state to his friend from Missouri, that as the bill stood, he could not vote for it. He did not think that it was well worded, and therefore suggested to his friend to move to recommit it, with a view of its being brought in again in a more perfect shape.

Mr. LINN declined recommitting the bill, and expressed the hope that it would pass as it was.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 26, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Trotter, Wall, Webster, and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Strange, Tipton, White, and Williams—11.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, June 13, 1838.

Petitions were, on leave, presented by Mr. INGHAM of Connecticut, Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, and Mr. HOWARD of Maryland.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a joint resolution in favor of Mary Shepherd and the other heirs of Captain Frederick M. Bell, deceased; which was ordered to a third reading to-day.

Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky, from the same committee, made a minority report on Senate bill giving effect to the 8th article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain; which was committed to the same Committee of the Whole having charge of the bill.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to settle the construction of the act regulating the pay of paymasters in the army of the United States.

Mr. McK. also reported, with an amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the heirs of General William Eaton.

Mr. McK. also reported a joint resolution authorizing the authorities of the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, to reopen certain streets that had been enclosed by the construction of the works of Fort Wayne; which was read twice.

Mr. OWENS then appealed to the indulgence of the House to act upon this resolution at once. It was, he said, of very great importance to some valuable improvements contemplated, and now in course of progress, by the city of Savannah. The property through which these enclosed streets passed had been conveyed to the United States for the purpose of erecting the fort; but that work having been altogether abandoned, the property was of no use whatever to the Government, but would be of great advantage to the city, as well as to the United States itself, from the improvements that would be made upon it. He, therefore, hoped the House would assent to his motion, and he moved the engrossment of the resolution.

The House did assent, nem. diss. and the resolution was ordered to be read a third time this day on further motion of Mr. OWENS.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Whereas, the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred copies of letters, documents, and communications, called for by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th of December last, in relation to the delay of the sailing of the Exploring Expedition, with instructions to investigate the causes of delay, etc. have selected such parts thereof, as in their judgment may be material in such investigation. Therefore,

Resolved, That the Clerk cause the same to be arranged in chronological order, with an index designating the name of the author of each paper, and of the person to whom it is addressed, with its date; and when the same shall be so arranged and prepared, he is required to cause the usual number of copies to be printed.

Resolved, further, That the Clerk cause the remainder of said copies, the same having been rejected by the said committee as unnecessary to be printed, to be in like manner arranged, indexed, and bound, and preserved among the documents of the House.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS PRIOR TO 1800.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution proposing to set apart Saturday next, after 11 o'clock, for the consideration of the French spoliation bill.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay it on the table, but subsequently withdrew the motion, and the resolution was rejected without a division.

PEACE SOCIETIES.

Mr. LEGARE, from the same committee, made a report on the subject of a number of memorials referred to that committee from the Peace Society of New York and others.

Mr. HOWARD, under instructions of the committee, moved to print 10,000 extra copies of this report.

Mr. PETRIKIN objecting to this motion—

Mr. HOWARD moved a suspension of the rule; which was agreed to—ayes 101, noes not counted.

Mr. CUSHING concurred in the motion to print, as well as in the ability of the report as a State paper, but without assenting to all its views.

TEXAS.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the same committee, made the following report; which was read:

The committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred sundry Executive communications, and resolutions of State Legislatures, together with numerous petitions and memorials relating to the annexation of Texas to the United States, presented at the late and present sessions of Congress, report:

That there is now no proposition pending in this House either for the admission of the Republic of Texas, as a State, into the Union, or for its territorial annexation to the United States.

The committee do not deem it advisable to recommend any action on the part of the House of Representatives calculated to prejudge any such proposition, should it hereafter be formally submitted for decision, or to forestal public sentiment in relation thereto. In consideration whereof, the following resolution is reported:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the whole subject, and that all the papers relating thereto, and to them referred, be laid on the table.

Mr. CUSHING called for a division of the question, so that it might be taken first upon that clause of the report which proposed to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He dissented from the report, and intended, before he sat down, to move a recommitment, with a view to have the subject more deliberately and argumentatively presented to the House. It was due to the country and the subject. The preamble says there is no proposition before the House. This might, in strict technical parliamentary language, be correct, as there was no motion or resolution pending in the House for the annexation of Texas; but Mr. C. denied that this was in substance correct. Three States of the Union, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, have passed resolutions in favor of the admission of Texas into the Union; and of two of the States, at least, the resolutions have been presented here, and are in the possession of the House. In addition to which, Texas herself had directly applied to the United States for admission. This proposition was pending now, and in force, and was not, (as the late report of the Secretary of State would seem to intimate,) withdrawn from the cognizance of this Government.

By the latest intelligence from Texas, the Senate of that Republic had distinctly refused to withdraw the application. Some gentlemen might think that this proposition was within the cognizance of the Executive only, as in the first instance; but he maintained the contrary most positively. Congress, the House, the people of the United States, were under no obligation to wait, in such a matter, for the initiation of the Executive in regard to it. The representatives of the people have the same power and right to act upon it in the initiation. He might not be disposed to do right. It was the duty of the House to see to the rights and interests of the people upon this vital question. The Constitution does not give to the Executive any power to admit new States. It is for Congress to do it so far as power resides any where. Let Congress, let the House, speak, and speak out to the country and the world. Furthermore, three of the States, Ohio, Michigan, and Massachusetts, have sent here resolutions solemnly remonstrating against the annexation of Texas. It was due to those three States, also, to express an opinion promptly upon the subject. It was due to thousands upon thousands of petitioners, whose petitions on this subject load the table, to express an opinion. They ask it; they demand it; they have a right to it. How long is this House to fold itself in the mantle of its dignity; covering itself up in dullness; refusing to utter its opinion; suppressing opinion and debate; disdaining, as it were, to treat the people fairly, in the light of day, manfully and honestly, as becomes their representatives?

Mr. C. insisted upon the duty of the committee to make a full argumentative report. He would not undertake to discuss the merits of the question. He was conscious it would be out of order, and he had no disposition on this or any other question to debate out of order; and he had therefore confined himself strictly and rigidly to the question immediately pending. He desired to see a full report upon the subject, and therefore he submitted the following motion:

That the report and accompanying papers be recommitted to the same committee, with instructions to make a report thereon in full as to the merits of the questions presented by the resolutions of the Legislatures of the several States of Tennessee, Alabama, Michigan, Ohio, and Massachusetts, and of the various petitions before the House, on the subject of Texas.

Mr. CARTER took the converse ground, that there was no direct question of the annexation of Texas before the House. Whatever question there was, was a mere incidental one, and the committee had pursued a most prudential course, for which he highly commended them.

Mr. ADAMS propounded an inquiry to Mr. DROMGOOLE, whether the committee had read the petitions.

Mr. DROMGOOLE was understood to deny the right or propriety of Mr. ADAMS to put such a question. The committee had made a report, and the country could judge of it. He would not submit to be interrogated in such a manner.

Mr. PICKENS was in favor of Mr. CUSHING's motion, though for different reasons. He desired to meet the issue tendered, and to have some definite action recommended, especially as they were told at the late session that the North would prefer a dissolution of the Union to an annexation of Texas. The question ought to be met at once, for if the United States did not acquire that influence in Texas, Great Britain would.

Mr. CUSHMAN held that such a proposition should come from the Texan Republic itself; but there was none such before the House, and, in order to put a stop to this discussion, he demanded the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS begged the gentleman to withdraw it, if only for the purpose of affording time for an answer to his argument.

Mr. CUSHMAN declined; but the House refused to second it—ayes 74, nays 81.

Mr. HOWARD then obtained the floor, but gave way to Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, on whose motion the House passed to the orders of the day.

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Union, Mr. CRAIG in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the "bill granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," the question being on the amendment of Mr. LINCOLN, as modified, by engrafting thereon the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD, as before given.

Mr. CHAPMAN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at length in an earnest support of the pre-emption system, and in a full reply to the objections urged against it.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, followed on the same side.

Mr. ROBERTSON proceeded to oppose the bill, and the policy involved in it; and had not concluded when the House took its daily recess.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Pursuant to the order, the House met at half past three o'clock, and went again into Committee of the Whole, upon the pre-emption rights bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CUSHING followed in support of the bill, and argued at length upon the abstract questions of rights of property; and upon the practical wisdom and necessity of the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD made some explanation of his remarks on a former day, and urged some further objections to some of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND spoke at length in favor of his proposed amendment, and in favor of the principle of granting pre-emption rights. After proceeding some time, he gave way to

Mr. EVANS, who moved that the committee rise, which motion was decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 70.

Mr. GARLAND resumed his remarks, and went more particularly into an examination of the provisions of the bill, as contrasted with the amendment he had offered.

Mr. SNYDER proposed the following proviso:

Provided, however. That no person who has settled, occupied, or cultivated any portion of such quarter section, under a previous settler, and by his permission, shall be allowed to avail himself of any such division of a quarter section.

Which motion was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. LINCOLN, as modified by the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD, which was rejected: ayes 47, noes 69—not a quorum.

Some discussion ensued as to the best mode of proceeding, there being evidently a quorum present.

Mr. LINCOLN explained that the amendment pending was the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD, as modified by his suggestion.

Mr. BELL proposed that the question upon these amendments be taken pro forma, with a view that the questions should be deliberately taken in the House to-morrow; and that the bill should be taken out of the committee to-night.

This course meeting the assent of the House, amendments were offered, pro forma, by Messrs. MAY and LINCOLN.

Mr. LEWIS submitted an amendment providing for the claims of those who lost their claims under the Choctaw treaty, but after considerable discussion on the point, it was ruled out of order, on the ground of its being in substance the same as a bill already before the House.

Mr. BRIGGS asked if amendments could not be offered in the House to-morrow.

The CHAIR replied that they could be without doubt.

Mr. CASEY then said he hoped the committee would rise, and he knew it to be the disposition of the friends of the bill to devote the whole of the day to morrow to the subject. He moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

Some conversation ensued; after which,

Mr. BRIGGS renewed the motion to rise and report the bill.

The question was taken on the amendments proposed by Mr. GARLAND and Mr. LOOMIS, and they were both rejected pro forma.

The committee then rose and reported the bill, with the amendments.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a report of the quantity of land required to satisfy outstanding military bounty land warrants granted by Virginia; which, on motion of Mr. MERCER, was laid on the table.

The following resolutions were submitted on leave:

On motion of Mr. TURNEY,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of horses and equipage that have been turned over the officers of the United States, by mounted volunteers, who have served in Florida.

On motion of Mr. WORD,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Yott, in the county of Lafayette, in the State of Mississippi via Chulahomo, in Marshall county, Hancocks, Labrous, and Hernando, in De Soto county, to Memphis, in the State of Tennessee.

On motion,

The House adjourned, at half past 8 o'clock.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, June 13, 1838.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition from sundry citizens of German township, in Harrison county, Ohio, setting forth their utter detestation of the practice of duelling, and asking the passage of a law disqualifying all persons from office, who may, in any manner, have been participants in a duel.

Mr. A. said, as this subject had already received the action of the Senate, he would move its reception, and that it be laid on the table.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Martin W. Smith, asking the survey of a route for a railroad from Lake Michigan to Du Buque: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred House bill for the relief of William Ferguson and sureties, reported the same without amendment, and recommended its passage.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, made a report on the following bills received from the House of Representatives:

The bill for the relief of Josiah Clark;

The bill for the relief of Charles Coffin;

Which were reported without amendment, and their passage recommended.

The bill for the relief of William Dawes;

The bill for the relief of Robert McBride;

The bill for the relief of Conrad Shroff;

The bill for the relief of Gillett S. Fisk;

The bill for the relief of George Bushly;

The bill for the relief of John Weaver;

Mr. KING presented certain documents in relation to the claim of Sandy Walker; which were referred to the Committee on Claims

On motion of Mr. TIPTON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether any and if any what steps have been taken to carry into effect the object of the resolutions of the Senate of the 21st May, 1836, requesting the Executive of the United States to exchange lands southwest of the Missouri river for lands owned by the Pottawatomies and other Indians.

Mr. TIPTON also submitted the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation to defray the expenses necessarily incurred and remaining unsatisfied in negotiations with the Miami Indians for a cession of their lands in Indiana.

Mr. WEBSTER gave notice that he should to-morrow morning call up Mr. WILLIAMS's motion for leave to bring in a bill for a joint British and American commission of exploration and survey, to determine on the northeastern boundary of the United States, in accordance with the treaty of 1783, which motion had, on Mr. W's desire, been laid on the table. Mr. W. gave this notice merely that Senators might have before them the two maps of the country in question, recently printed by order of the Senate, without which the details of the subject could not be well understood.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill granting land to the Territory of Wisconsin, for the purpose of making a canal, to open the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river, reported the same with the amendment received from the House, and moved a concurrence therein; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the House bill making an appropriation for certain public buildings in the Territory of Wisconsin, reported the same with an amendment; which amendment was agreed to, and the bill passed.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported House bill for the relief of Thomas Parsons, without amendment, and recommended its passage.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to take up the bill making further provision for the collection of the public revenue.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to lay this bill on the table, at least until the subject which had emanated from the committee had been disposed of.

Mr. WEBSTER having acquiesced, the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS gave notice that he would move to set apart Monday next for the purpose of acting on the pension bills received from the House of Representatives, which had been favorably reported on in the Senate.

The bill for the benefit of the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company, in the State of Indiana, was then taken up.

Mr. SEVIER said, with a view to meet the objections of all parties, he moved the following amendment:

"That there be, and the same is hereby, granted to the State of Indiana, each alternate section or fractional section of the unappropriated public land which lies on both sides of the New Albany and Mount Carmel railroad, and between New Albany, on the Ohio, and the Wabash river, all in said State of Indiana, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the New Albany and Mount Carmel railroad; and it shall be the duty of the President, so soon as the lands thus granted shall be designated, to cause patents to issue for the same to the State of Indiana.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested that it would be better to lay the bill on the table, with a view that the amendment be printed.

Mr. SEVIER wished an immediate action on the measure.

Mr. ALLEN did not like the amendment, though friendly to the proposition, and was willing to give a grant to the State for the purpose of making that road.

Mr. KING made a few remarks against the amendment, when the bill was laid on the table, and the amendment ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS then moved to take up the resolution submitted by him some days since, in relation to the adjournment of the session from the 2d July next until the second Monday in November.

Mr. M. stated the object he had in view, which was to facilitate the public business. If the measure were adopted by both houses, the business left unfinished could then be taken up from where it was left at the adjournment, instead of commencing it anew, as was the case in the present mode.

Mr. KING suggested that it lie over a day or two, when

Mr. MORRIS withdrew his motion.

The special order of the day was called, when the bill for the relief of Major-General Alexander McComb was read.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had a kind of tacit understanding with the Senator who reported the bill, that a day's notice should be given. He would be ready in the morning.

Mr. NORVELL expressed a desire that the bill should be definitely acted on at once, in order that the General might know his fate in relation to it.

Mr. SEVIER said he should move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. HUBBARD replied to Mr. BUCHANAN, that it was not his motion on which the bill was taken up, but intimated his wish that it should be taken up on to-morrow and disposed of, which was assented to.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The bill to set apart a belt of land on the western borders of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, as bounty lands, to be granted to settlers engaged for a term of years in the defence of the frontier.

Mr. TALLMADGE desired to hear the object of this bill explained; when

Mr. FULTON rose, and explained the bill at length.

Mr. STRANGE opposed it with some zeal, and the bill was further debated until near 4 o'clock; Messrs. FULTON, LINN, CLAY of Alabama, and SEVIER advocating, and Messrs. STRANGE, DAVIS, PRENTISS, and NILES opposing it.

Mr. SEVIER offered the following amendment, to be added to the end of the proviso, in the seventh section of the bill, viz:

"Or to embrace any improved or occupied tract of land, or to affect any vacant tract of land, now or hereafter, which any person may choose to purchase or enter."

Which amendment being adopted, the question then was upon the engrossment of the bill, which question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—ayes 10, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, and Smith of Indiana—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business, and afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, June 14, 1838.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved to take up the resolution of Mr. BOON to fix the period of the adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Objection being made, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 82, nays 55.

So the House refused to take up the resolution for consideration.

Mr. FOTTS moved to print 2,000 extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy on the Exploring Expedition.

Mr. PAYNTER, on leave, presented the proceedings of a public meeting of citizens of Pennsylvania on the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. CARTER renewed his motion to make certain pension bills (as given in Monday night's Globe) the special order for Tuesday next.

Objection being made, Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 88, nays 81; not being two thirds the motion was disagreed to.

TEXAS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the annexation of Texas, with the motion of Mr. CUSHING to recommit the report with instructions, (as printed in yesterday's Globe.)

Mr. THOMPSON now moved the following as a further amendment:

"With instructions to report a joint resolution directing the President to take the necessary steps for the annexation of Texas to the United States as soon as it can be done consistently with the treaty stipulations of this Government."

Mr. HOWARD remarked that, since yesterday, it would be perceived the question had undergone a total change. Then, the question was whether a proposition was before this Government coming from Texas for annexation; now, it was proposed for us to make an application to that Republic.

Mr. H. then went on for a few minutes till the expiration of the morning hour, when the orders of the day were called for.

The joint resolution in favor of the authorities of the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, and the bill to authorize the issuing of land warrants in certain cases, were severally read the third time and passed.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

The "bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands" was then taken up.

This bill had been reported to the House, from the Committee of the Whole, last night, with sundry amendments, the first of which was the one to exclude from the operation of the bill the lands lately acquired by treaty with the Miami tribe of Indians, in the State of Indiana.

Mr. LINCOLN then renewed the following amendment proposed by him in committee:

In line thirty-first, after the word States, add—"or to any sections, or fractions of sections, of lands included within the location of any incorporated town, or to the alternate sections to other alternate sections granted to the use of any canal, railroad, or other public improvement on the route of such canal, railroad, or other public improvement, or to any portions of public lands, surveyed or otherwise, which have been actually selected as sites for cities or towns, lotted into smaller quantities than eighty acres, and settled upon and occupied for the purposes of trade, and not of agricultural cultivation and improvement."

Mr. L. proceeded to advocate his amendment, and demonstrated the necessity of its adoption from, among other reasons, the speculating attempt lately made by a bill in relation to Southport, in the Territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri opposed the amendment, as inexpedient and unnecessary, the effect of which would be to encumber and embarrass the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky advocated the principle of a prospective pre-emption law, rather than the practice of retrospective laws passed every two years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana advocated the amendment.

Mr. CRARY was understood to oppose the amendment, unless it was modified.

Mr. LYON informed the House that the Commissioner of the General Land Office had ruled that the principles of the system applied only to agricultural settlements.

Mr. CRARY further opposed the amendment, as it was, in effect, taxing the labor of the citizens for the benefit of the Government. Mr. C. also replied to the objection of Mr. LINCOLN on the Southport bill.

Mr. BOON appealed to Mr. LINCOLN to withdraw his amendment for the present, to permit the question to be first taken on the amendment in referenee to the Miami reserve.

Mr. GOODE caused an amendment to be read, which he notified the House it was his intention to move, in reference to the Miami Canal lands, in the State of Ohio. He asked the mover of the pending one to accept it.

Mr. LINCOLN declined, for the obvious ground that it conflicted with his own.

Mr. TILLINGHAST replied to Mr. CRARY, and contested the point that the waste or public lands, selected for the public lands, were only made valuable by the labor and enterprise of the settlers, because they selected them for their natural advantages.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended on motion of Mr. LINCOLN, which was further modified by him, was then agreed to.

The question then recurred on the following amendment of Mr. LINCOLN:

To insert in the 26th line, after the words United States, and upon the third proviso in said bill, the following words: "nor shall the benefit of this act extend to any person who has before availed himself of a pre-emption right to the entry of any of the public lands and acquired a title thereto by reason of such entry."

Mr. HARRISON asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered

Mr. EWING renewed his amendment to give the State of Indiana the pre-emption right to the lands acquired by the late Miami treaty.

Mr. SHIELDS contended that the amendment was not then in order, upon the pending one, and the CHAIR, (temporarily occupied by Mr. CONNOR,) coincided in that opinion, and ruled it out.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, opposed the pending amendment, but moved another, providing that no person who secured titles under this bill should be entitled hereafter, &c.

The CHAIR ruled this amendment to be, also, out of order.

Mr. YELL opposed the pending amendment; and though he should vote for the bill if it was adopted, yet he should do so with much reluctance: for it would bear very hard upon his constituents, as they were recent settlers, since the passage of the last act. He could see no reason why it should be engrafted on this bill, when no such provision was to be found in the former one. Mr. Y. also advocated the original bill with much earnestness, but avowed his readiness to go for any and every amendment which would protect the rights of the settlers, and prevent the perpetration of fraud.

Mr. SHIELDS, also, opposed the amendment.

Mr. LINCOLN advocated the justice of its adoption.

Mr. SNYDER opposed it, and went into a variety of details, showing how injuriously it would operate upon a most meritorious class of citizens.

The amendment was further opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON of Louisiana, POPE, MARVIN;

And supported by Messrs. HARLAN and WILLIAMS of North Carolina,

When the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, and the House took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met at half past three; went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the pre-emption right bill.

The question pending was the amendment of Mr. LINCOLN, before given, to restrict the benefits of the bill to those who had not heretofore established a pre-emption title.

Mr. CRARY, in opposition to this amendment, said he was opposed to it on the following grounds: The lands of the Government, "in incorporated towns," were excluded from the operation of the pre-emption principle by the original bill. It was, therefore, unnecessary to adopt this portion of the amendment. He was not disposed to give to the Government the benefit of the labors and exertions of any of the people of the West, who have been so active and enterprising as to become the pioneers of the wilderness, and thereby obtain possession of sites for future cities and villages. Whatever were the present value of those places, it had resulted mainly from the labors of those who had already settled upon or near them.

The Government had done nothing to give that value, and it could not justly claim the benefit of it. He could recollect when they would not sell at the Government price. Six years ago the whole of Chicago could have been purchased for a small consideration. Eight years ago the lands along the line of the Illinois canal were prized so low, that the State applied to this House to exchange large portions of them for lands more valuable in the southern portion of the State. They had since risen in value by the industry and enterprise of those who had taken up their residence in that part of the country. He was unwilling that the Government should make the reservations contemplated by the amendment, for the purpose of having value given to them by the labor and toil of any portion of his constituents. All former reservations had operated as a tax upon the industry of those places where they were situated. In the case of Perrysburg, alluded to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he had no doubt it had retarded the growth of the place, besides prejudicing the interests of every person residing there.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had alluded to a bill rejected by the Committee on Public Lands, for the improvement of the harbor at Southport, on lake Michigan. He had called it one of the greatest speculations ever devised. Mr. C. could not thus view it. It only set apart something like three hundred acres of land for the purpose of constructing, not "a commercial wharf," but a harbor for the protection of commerce. It could not prove a great speculation to those concerned; but would be of essential service to the security of the lake navigation. Lake Michigan was now virtually without harbors. A vessel leaving Chicago must run two hundred miles before she could find a port of safety in a storm. If any doubted the expediency of making more harbors on that Lake, or had any constitutional scruples on the subject, he hoped they would be removed; he knew they would be, if, they were only found upon its waters when a storm was raging there in its fury. If this House could be placed on board one of our lake vessels on such an occasion, and the vote was then to be taken, there would be no negatives on a bill for the improvement of our harbors. The House had done great injustice to the commerce of the lakes by neglecting to make appropriations for the improvement of harbors. That commerce was not to be estimated by the amount of tonnage entered at any one port, but by the number of voyages made during a season. Thus estimated, it would approximate very nearly to the coasting tonnage of the Atlantic States. A large amount of our Atlantic tonnage was employed where we lately proposed to send our Exploring Expedition, or where we had a navy costing us five millions yearly to protect it. If the protection of the lake commerce was unconstitutional, this navy was also unconstitutional. A navy was created to fight our battles upon the sea in time of war, and should be laid up in port in time of peace, if commerce is to have no other protection than is furnished to it by natural means. You send your navy to the coasts of the Pacific to give relief to vessels in distress, and no one is troubled with constitutional scruples; but the moment we propose to give like relief by the improvement of a harbor on the lakes, it is denounced as a violation of fundamental principles. With these remarks he would conclude with the hope that the amendment would not be adopted.

Mr. WORD addressed the committee at some length, also in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, then moved a call of the House, which was refused—ayes 40, noes not counted.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was concurred in—ayes 75, noes 73.

The following amendment was then taken up, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, the question being on concurring therewith.

To strike out "certain fractions of the public lands within the land district of Palmyra, in the State of Missouri, which were reserved from sale in consequence of the surveys of Spanish and French grants, but are found to be without the lines of said grants," and insert "certain fractions, or regular legal subdivisions of the public lands, which have been reserved from sale in consequence of the filing of a claim to a French or Spanish grant or donation, which was found, or which hereafter may be found, on actual survey or location of such claim or claims, to be without the limits of said claim, or any other reservation, except as is herein before specified."

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto a proviso, that each pre-emptioner should certify before the register that he had settled his claim for his own sole use and benefit, and that no other person was interested in any way whatever, directly or indirectly, but that it was his bona fide intention to occupy and cultivate the same, with certain penalties and forfeitures in purchase money, &c. in case of deception.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, objected to this amendment as a most dangerous infraction upon the policy of land titles in the new States. He would cheerfully consent to interpose any check against fraudulent pre-emption purchases, and was willing, therefore, to support the provision moved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TITUS] in Committee of the Whole, which required an affidavit the entry was intended for the personal use and benefit of the pre-emptor, and not with any previous agreement or understanding to convey the land to a third person. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] will have the injurious tendency to restrict alienation, and to involve titles in perpetual uncertainty and doubt. Whatever steps are taken should be preventive, but the patent of the Government when it issues ought to furnish conclusive evidence of title, and foreclose all litigation.

Mr. BRONSON said that he rose to advocate the principle contained in the amendment; that the general provisions of the amendment met his most hearty approval, and he hoped they would meet with equal favor from all the friends of the bill, among which he included himself; that he was strongly in favor of the measure of pre-emption, so far as it goes to protect and benefit the actual bona fide and honest settler; that, for that class of persons he would go as far as any member on this floor. The bill now under discussion, was, on the face of it, one for the benefit of that portion of our citizens, and it claimed to be a measure for their protection and for their benefit only—a measure to secure to them the just rewards of their toil, privations, and hardships. The whole course of the debate had proceeded upon that ground, and the friends of the bill had not been understood as asking any thing beyond this. No person desired to make this law a shield to protect and screen the speculator in his ill-gotten spoils, or aid him to perfect his schemes for engrossing the choice portions of the public domain. At all events, Mr. B. said, that such an object, if any had it in view, should meet with no favor from him; and that, while he would go to the utmost extent to secure and protect the actual and bona fide settler, he would, by every means that human ingenuity could devise, confine the provisions of the bill to that object, and that alone; and in pursuance of these views, he would cheerfully support the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS.] But, there was two or three objections to this amendment, which he desired to point out to the House, and particularly to the gentleman who offered it, in the hope that he would modify it in such manner as to remedy the defects which it contained, and make it satisfactory to himself, as well as many other friends of the bill. In the first place, the amendment provides that the affidavit to be made and filed by the pre-emptioner, shall be made at the time of receiving his patent, and filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington. This, sir, is imposing an unnecessary and onerous duty upon the pre-emptioner. The provision should be, that he should make the affidavit at the time of claiming his pre-emption right, and at the time he pays his money and obtains his certificate of payment from the Receiver of the land office in which the land lies; and the affidavit should be filed with the Register of the land office of such district; and the Register, if needful, may transmit it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington.

Another and more important objection to the amendment is, that it provides that any title acquired from such pre-emptions in pursuance of previous agreement or contract, or, in other words, in violation of the provisions of that amendment, shall be absolutely void. This, sir, is a provision altogether too broad, and might operate most injuriously and unjustly upon subsequent bona fide purchasers. It would lead to great instability and uncertainty as to all titles obtained through pre-emptioners, and be a fruitful source of litigation and trouble. The title should be void in the hands of any person purchasing from the pre-emptioner in pursuance of previous bargain or contract, or with a knowledge of the fact that the law had been wilfully violated; but the subsequent innocent and bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, should be protected. There should be a point in the transfer of the title, beyond which litigation should cease. Now, sir, if the gentleman will so modify his amendment as to provide that the title shall not be defeated in the hands of a subsequent bona fide purchaser, it will render the amendment not only much more complete, but will, I believe, render it satisfactory to a large proportion of the friends of the bill.

Mr. BRIGGS having modified the amendment according to the suggestion of Mr. BRONSON, it was then further advocated by Messrs. LINCOLN and BRIGGS, and opposed by Messrs. MAY, YELL, BOON, and JOHNSON of Louisiana.

Mr. GOODE read the following, which he wished to move as an amendment, but it was decided not to be in order:

Provided, That the right of pre-emption shall extend, under the provisions of this act, at $2 50 per acre, to all lands within the alternate sections to the United States on the Miami, Wabash, and Erie canals, in the State of Ohio, which have been settled on, occupied, and improved for the purposes of cultivation, prior to the first day of December, 1835, and which are still in the possession and occupation of the original settler, or his or her heirs at law, not amounting to more than one quarter section, and being all in one tract.

Mr. G. said he should, when in order, offer an amendment, to include a few meritorious cases of early settlers within those alternate sections, whose claims were meritorious.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then moved the following:

Resolved, That the bill entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," be referred to a select committee, to be composed of one member from each State, with instructions to report bill repealing all laws which direct the sale of the public land, or any part thereof, at public auction, and graduating the price of the public lands in such manner as the committee may deem reasonable, fixing different prices for the public lands, having respect to the periods of time they may remain unsold after being brought into market; and providing for the distribution of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands, or the lands themselves, among the several States, according to their Federal numbers, from and after such day as the committee may deem proper: and providing for pre-emptions in favor of all the now bona fide settlers upon the public lands, with a view to secure homes for themselves and families, and not to secure the lands for others; and to prevent settlements upon the public lands from being made after the passage of this act, until the lands are legally entered and paid for.

Mr. CASEY warmly opposed the recommitment of the bill with the instructions. He wished the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] to state to the House the means he would wish Congress to adopt to prevent settlements on the Government land; that no such provision could, or would, or ought to be made, nor could it be carried into effect if made.

Mr. MASON of Ohio begged Mr. UNDERWOOD to withdraw his motion, which he declined.

Mr. MENEFEE then went at length into an argument against a prospective system of pre-emption rights, which he called a system of plunder, to the injury and wrong of the old States, unless it could be properly restricted and guarded. His argument was generally in favor of the principle of Mr. CLAY'S land bill.

Mr. BOON said he was not aware that the subject of the gentleman's speech from Kentucky, [Mr. MENEFEE,] was before the House. He had understood the question in order to be on the proposition of the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] to recommit the bill with certain instructions. But Mr. B. had ever been opposed to Mr. CLAY'S land bill, and he thought it would be time enough to talk of distributing when it should be ascertained that there was something to distribute. Upwards of twenty-eight millions of dollars had a short time since been distributed among the States, and the effect produced by the measure was a bankrupt Treasury. He was, therefore, opposed to any more distribution acts, at least until there should be a surplus in the Treasury to distribute. Mr. B. said he was of opinion that the bill under consideration was then in a shape as acceptable to its friends as it would be by further amendment, and he would therefore move the "previous question;" but on request, subsequently withdrew the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. UNDERWOOD'S motion; which were ordered.

Mr. CUSHMAN then renewed the demand for the previous question, which was not seconded—ayes 86, noes 98.

The question on recommitment was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 123, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, William B Calhoun, John Calhoon, Chambers, Childs, Clowney, Connor, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Filmore, Goode, James Graham, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hawkins, Hoffman, Hopkins, William Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Lincoln, Samson Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Potts, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, A. H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanley, Stratton, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, John White, Lewis Williams, and Yorke—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Borden, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Gallup, Rice Garland, Grant, Gray, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Holsey, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Robert M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, Maury, May, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Pennybacker, Petriken, Phelps, Plumer, Pope, Potter, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Reily, Richardson, Ridgway, Rives, Sheffer, Shields, Sheplor, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, Worthington, and Yell—123.

So the motion was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on Mr. BRIGGS'S amendment.

Mr. CASEY opposed the amendment with great earnestness. He was in favor of the bill and believed that, in good faith, it ought to pass. It would greatly promote the interest of a large and worthy and very meritorious class of citizens—a class of citizens in every way deserving the liberality, or, at least, the justice, of the National Legislature. He wished the bill to pass, but feared the long speeches of its friends would jeopardize its passage; but, above all, he dreaded and deprecated this flood of amendments that was flowing on the bill from all quarters, by friends and foes, to most of which he had objected, but, above all, he objected to the one then under consideration. He objected to it upon the ground that it would render uncertain, unsafe, and insecure land titles acquired under it. He was willing every possible guard should be thrown around the bill to prevent fraud in acquiring titles to land. Punish the individual who, to avail himself of the act, should swear falsely—punish him with fine and imprisonment if you please, or any other punishment or disqualification, but never, by your legislation, unsettle, or render uncertain or insecure, his land title. Amidst the oft repeated complaints made to the land system of the Federal Government by the people of the new States, they always applauded it for one thing—the title to their land was good, no uncertainty in the title, no lawsuits about land titles; but he predicted that, if this amendment prevailed, there would be more land litigation and lawsuits in the new States in the next five years than had been, under the present system, in the last fifty years, or since the organization of the present land system, going, as it proposed to do, behind the patent.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to—yeas 113, nays 86.

Mr. BELL, under instructions from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved an amendment excepting, or suspending till the claims were acted upon, the Choctaw reservations under the treaty of Dancing Rabit Creek.

The amendment was sustained by Messrs. BELL and PENNYCACKER, and opposed by Mr. PRENTISS; when it was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. MAY proposed the following as a new section.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That any person, being the head of a family, who now is settled on, or who shall hereafter settle on, any of the public lands of the United States, and who shall continue to reside on and cultivate the same for the period of twelve months, shall, upon making proof thereof, according to the provisions of this act, be entitled to a right of pre-emption to one quarter section.

Mr. M. asked for the yeas and nays on the proposition which were ordered.

Mr. POTTS moved that the House adjourn: lost.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question.

The CHAIR being called upon to state the question, replied, that the last amendment of the Committee of the Whole (as given above) not having been concurred in, all the amendments to that which had been agreed to, would necessarily be cut off, should the previous question be sustained.

The House, however, refused to second it, only 52 passing through the tellers.

Mr. POPE then suggested a modification to Mr. MAY'S amendment, so as to provide that all the terms, restrictions, and limitations of the bill should have an equal application in the proposed section, which Mr. M. accepted.

Mr. MAY'S amendment was rejected—yeas 52, nays 130.

Mr. MASON of Ohio then proposed the following amendment:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the public faith shall not by any thing in this act contained, or by the passage thereof, be considered as thereby pledged, either directly or by implication, that Congress will or ought hereafter to renew the same, or any other act, granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, who may, contrary to law, settle thereon from and after the first day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri said that, though the amendment of the committee now pending was introduced by himself, and though it affected his constituents, yet rather than longer to delay the bill, and jeopardise it, perhaps, altogether, he would himself demand the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky then moved to lay the bill on the table, but it was lost without a division.

The House refused to second the demand for the previous question, only 60 voting for it.

Mr. MASON'S amendment was then disagreed to without a division.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended by the various propositions agreed to, was then concurred to.

Mr. BOON then demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the House—ayes 95, noes 48, and the main question was ordered without a division.

The main question was on ordering the bill to a third reading, and thereon Mr. GRIFFIN of South Carolina, and Mr. MONTGOMERY of North Carolina, simultaneously asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were, yeas 132, nays 70, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Borden, Bronson, Buchanan, John Calhoon, Cambreleng, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Gray, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, Nath. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Marvin, Martin, Maury, May, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Plumer, Pope, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Reily, Ridgway, Rives, Rumsey, Sheffer, Shields, Sheplor, Sibley, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, John White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, Worthington, and Yell—132.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Banks, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Campbell, Chambers, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, James Graham, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, John W. Jones, Kennedy, Lincoln, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maxwell, Mercer, Milligan, Ogle, Parris, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Robertson, Robinson, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Slade, Stanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Wise, and Yorke—70.

So the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, then rose for the purpose, he said, of moving to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR said it was not in order till the bill was read a third time.

Mr. EWING, however, immediately rose and said "I move to recommit the bill."

Mr. HARLAN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. EWING called for tellers, which being ordered, were ayes 72, noes 76.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The bill was then put on its third reading, and having been nearly read through by the Clerk—

Mr. MERCER rose to a question of order. He wished to know if the bill had been engrossed.

The SPEAKER said it had: and the Clerk was reading the engrossed copy.

The reading was then completed by the Clerk, when

Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri, demanded the previous question, but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, who moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out Mr. BELL'S amendment, and insert one in lieu thereof, which was read.

Mr. DUNCAN moved an adjournment, which was disagreed to—ayes 69, noes 75.

Mr. CUSHMAN said that, thinking this bill had been discussed long enough, and seeing no necessity for recommitting it, he, therefore, demanded the previous question, which was seconded—ayes 84, noes not counted—and the main question being ordered thereon—

Mr. BOON said he hoped the House would indulge him with the yeas and nays: for, by stepping for a moment to the reporter's desk while the vote on the engrossment of the bill was being taken, and just as his name was called, he missed his vote. As a warm and zealous friend of the bill, and from the position he occupied as chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, he desired an opportunity of recording his vote for it.

The House ordered the yeas and nays by a large majority; and being taken, they were—yeas 107, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Bell, Biddle, Boon, Bouldin, Bronson, John Calhoon, Cambreleng, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Gray, Hamer, Harrison, Harper, Haynes, Henry, Holsey, Hopkins, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Henry Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Martin, May, McKay, R. McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Naylor, Noble, Owens, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Pope, Pratt, John H. Prentiss, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Reily, Ridgway, Rives, Sheffer, Shields, Sheplor, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stone, Taylor, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, A. S. White, J. White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Word, Worthington, and Yell—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Aycrigg, Briggs, John Campbell, Chambers, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Dawson, Davies, Elmore, R. Fletcher, James Graham, Graves, Griffin, Halsted, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hoffman, Robert M. T. Hunter, John W. Jones, Lincoln, James M. Mason, Maxwell, Mercer, Montgomery, Ogle, Patterson, Peck, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Randolph, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Robertson, Russell, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Slade, Stanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, E. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, and Yorke—62.

So the bill was passed.

[In justice to those gentlemen whose names appear in the vote on the engrossment, and not on that of the final passage, it should be stated that the hour being late, (the first being considered the test vote, and not expecting the yeas and nays to be taken on the final passage,) they had left the House, after a laborious session of eleven hours. This does not apply to Mr. EWING of Indiana, who voted against the engrossment, but, though in his seat, did not respond to the two calls of his name on the final passage.]

On motion, at a quarter past 9 o'clock, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, June 14, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented to the Senate the proceedings of a numerous and respectable meeting of the democratic citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, convened at the county court-house on Monday evening last, at which a number of resolutions were adopted in favor of the immediate passage of the Independent Treasury bill now before Congress. He moved that these proceedings should be printed, and laid upon the table; which was ordered accordingly, after they had been read.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial from a number of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, in favor of the passage of the Independent Treasury bill, and against the establishment of a National Bank: laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS presented the memorial of John J. James and others, a committee appointed by a convention of delegates from the several banks in Ohio, praying such a modification of the law in relation to the receipts of money in payment of the public dues, as will avoid all discrimination not founded upon the prompt redemption and convertibility of paper into coin.

Mr. BENTON would like the Senator to state whether he was acquainted with the conduct of those banks? If they had not issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars, they had nothing to fear.

Mr. MORRIS explained, that no notes of a less denomination than five dollars, were issued by these banks at least until after the suspension. The last Legislature (and the gentleman knew the character of that) authorized the issue of notes of a less denomination, and then their notes were excluded of course: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Committee on Commerce were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of David Melville and D. B. Smith, relating to improvements in light-houses.

Mr. K. said that experiments were about to be made of the French lens, and the committee thought it inexpedient to make any report until after that test.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the bill from the House, requiring that the United States District Court in Tennessee should be held at Jackson was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and, by consent, read a third time, and passed.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate took up Mr. WILLIAMS's motion for leave to bring in a bill for instituting a joint commission—British and American—of exploration and survey, to determine the Northeastern boundary of the United States on the basis of the treaty of 1783.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke at large on the subject, chiefly with a view to show that the line designated by the treaty of 1783 was well defined and easily and readily to be found.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not rise with a view to debate the question at that time, nor did he know that he should at any future period. The subject was certainly one of great importance, and if the Senator from Massachusetts would let it lie over for a day or two, say to-morrow or next day at furthest, he would call it up himself.

Mr. WEBSTER having assented, the subject was laid on the table.

The following bills received from the House were read and referred:

The bill authorizing the issuing of land warrants in certain cases.

The joint resolve in favor of the authorities of the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia.

Mr. LUMPKIN said this was a matter of some consequence to the parties, and he was desirous to have it acted on with as little delay as possible, and if Senators had no objection, he would like it to have a third reading at once.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George T. Byard, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.

Mr. PRESTON moved to take up the joint resolution offered by him some time since in relation to the annexation of Texas.

Mr. SOUTHARD said, he thought the Senate was not prepared to go into the question at that late hour. It was a measure of very great importance; and as several of the Senators were absent from their seats he would move to lay it on the table.

Mr. SEVIER inquired of the Senator if the intention was to lay it on the table for the present, or was he to consider the motion as final.

Mr. SOUTHARD said, so far as he was concerned, he certainly desired that it should be final, but would withdraw it to give the Senator from South Carolina an opportunity of explaining.

Mr. CALHOUN said, as the Senate was not full, and the hour somewhat late, he would vote for laying the motion on the table for the present, but would move, if no one else did, to call it up at an early date. Mr. C. said, so far as the main object was concerned, he was prepared to vote for it; but the preamble contained averments in relation to the surrender of certain parts of the Territory, which he was not prepared to say were legitimate; and he could have wished that his colleague had stripped it of all extraneous matter, and presented it in a simple form. He not only wished to vote for the plain proposition of annexing that Territory, but also desired to present his views in relation to it.

Mr. PRESTON had his doubts if it were now laid on the table, whether it would be again taken up, and intimated the opinion that there was an evident disposition to get rid of the question.

Mr. LUMPKIN avowed his intention of going for the resolution as originally introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] It was in his opinion a subject full of importance to the people of the United States, and to the people of Texas, to whom he felt endeared by every tie of friendship and good feeling, and the measure should have his whole support.

Mr. CALHOUN would inform his colleague, if he alluded to him, that so far as he was concerned, he felt no disposition to avoid the measure, but was ready to give a direct vote on the question at issue; but with regard to the preamble and assertions contained therein, he was not prepared. He differed with his colleague in relation to them, but that weighed nothing. Mr. C. said he was for marching boldly up to the measure, and could only regret that it was delayed so long. He was afraid now there was not time to discuss the subject as its great magnitude required. It was indeed a most momentous question, full of important consequences; but he was ready now to meet it fully, fairly, and boldly. Mr. C expressed his belief that Texas was now a sovereign and independent State, and could never again come to Mexico.

Mr. PRESTON said nothing was further from him than wishing to interfere with the views of the gentleman from South Carolina; he would have yielded all matters of form merely, but he thought the preamble carried with it what was desirable to be retained. He had brought the matter before the Senate some six weeks since, and had given his own views upon it, and no friendly voice was then raised from any quarter. He had waited from time to for some manifestation of a disposition to act, but so far he had seen none. He certainly desired that the subject should have a most thorough investigation; but he feared it was too late for this now. It was apparent to his mind, that if the subject was once laid on the table, it would be in vain to get it up again this session; particularly as we had the intentions of the mover distinctly avowed.

Mr. SOUTHARD, so far as related to himself, he was certainly desirous that this question should not again come up during the session. It was too late a period now, he thought, to discuss it. He would suggest, however, to the gentleman, that although he [Mr. S.] would not vote for it's being taken up, there were others that might do so. Mr. S. thought it was understood from the delay which had taken place, that there would be no further discussion during this session. He would now renew his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the Senator from New Jersey would withdraw his motion for a moment, in order that he might make a single observation.

Mr. SOUTHARD assented; when,

Mr. CALHOUN said that he never knew the Senate to be wanting in courtesy, and it was judging rather too hard of that body to suppose that the resolution would not be taken up again. If, however, it was the determination of the Senate to lay it on table, with a view of not taking it up, he for one would be able to effect his object in voting against the preamble, and in favor of the resolution. He wished to do something more than vote. He wished to express his views on the subject. He thought there would be no hazard in laving the resolution on the table; if he thought there was, he would vote against the motion.

Mr. PRESTON said he had as high an opinion of, and as much respect for, the courtesy of the Senate as the gentleman had; but was it not expecting too much of that courtesy to suppose, with the feeling expressed by the mover, that if disposed of in that way, that it would be final for the present.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that to free himself from all responsibility, he would vote against laying the resolution on the table; and if the motion succeeded, he would himself move to take it up in a day or two, with a view to express his views on the subject.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that it appeared that he was between a cross fire, and saw no mode of escape, and would therefore not renew his motion, nor would he again make any motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. NORVELL. Then, Mr. President, I make the motion to lay it on the table, and ask the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken, when there appeared, for the motion 24, against it 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Southard, Wall, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Strange, Trotter, and White—14.

The bill for the relief of Pierre Menard and others was then taken up, and was advocated with great zeal by Messrs. LINN, GRUNDY, and ROBINSON, and opposed by Mr. WRIGHT (as far as allowance of interest was concerned) and Mr. NILES.

Mr. WRIGHT offered a specific amendment to the first section of the bill, striking out all that relates to the interest, admitting at the same time the right of the applicants to the principal.

This bill was discussed for some time with a warmth and fervor, not usual on private bills, owing to the very interesting incidents connected with the gallant conduct of the claimants.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, it was laid on the table,

And the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 15, 1838.

Mr. SNYDER of Illinois, after the reading of the journal, asked leave of the House to make an explanation in relation to an article that appeared in the Madisonian of yesterday.

Leave being given, Mr. S. rose and said:

MR. SPEAKER. I am constrained, by a sense of justice to myself and to the people whom I represent, to notice an editorial article in the Madisonian of yesterday—a paper printed in this city, and edited by Thomas Allen, printer to this House. The article is headed "The Illinois delegation—the Sub-Treasury." Sir, I will not take up the time of this House by reading it; all of its members have doubtless seen it; and I will not affect to disguise the fact that this article is intended for me. There are but three representatives from the State of Illinois, and I am the only one of that delegation, to my knowledge, who has given any intimation that he would support the Sub-Treasury bill. I would not now, in this manner, notice this article, were it not that the editor of that paper is an officer of this House. In these days of the licentiousness of the press, every public man receives a full measure of abuse; and I would have taken my share in silence, emanating from almost any other source; but emanating and sanctioned, as it is, by the official character of the editor, I feel bound to take this notice of it, in order that the antidote may go forth with the poison. It is true, the article makes no direct or specific charge of corruption. It is worse: it intimates it. Were it specific, I could the more readily defend my character from the foul charge. The author of the article intimates that I have solicited Executive favors and Executive smiles, and that promises and favors have been returned. Sir, I am not an applicant for office, neither have I ever received the smiles, promises, or favors of the President. Justice to him and to myself demands of me that here, in my place, I should say that that, as well as the charge of corruption insinuated by the article, is false and malicious.

The manner in which the editor of the Madisonian has violated his pledges made to a portion of the Democratic members of this House, before he received their votes for its printer—namely, that he would support the present Administration, and the rules and usages of the Democratic party—renders any other or further notice of him for the present unnecessary.

TEXAS.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the annexation of Texas, the questions pending being on the motion of Mr. CUSHING to recommit the report, with certain instructions, with a further instruction of Mr. THOMPSON, as printed in last evening's Globe.

Mr. HOWARD resumed his remarks in support of the report of the committee, and in opposition to both the proposed instructions, going at large into the whole subject generally. [A report of Mr. H's remarks is necessarily deferred.]

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CUSHING demanded the yeas and nays on that question; and they were ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his motion, to allow Mr. CUSHING to make an explanation of a personal nature, Mr. C. agreeing to renew it.

Mr. CUSHING then stated, that if he heard aright the chairman of the committee [Mr. HOWARD] had alluded to his remarks as a "censure" upon the committee. He had not intended to censure the committee. The majority had thought it their duty to report without expressing an opinion. He thought it their duty to express an opinion, and his remark conveyed no more censure upon them than theirs did upon him. He then, according to agreement, renewed the motion for the previous question, but said he should vote against it.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he had been requested to withdraw his motion, and he would do so.

The SPEAKER said the motion was now made by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CUSHING withdrew the motion.

Mr. ADAMS referred to the reply of Mr. DROMGOOLE yesterday, that he would not be catechized in relation to the doings of the committee; and said he wished to know whether the chairman of the committee took the same ground, and refused to answer.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he had put it as a point of order, that members of a committee could not be so interrogated in the House.

Mr. ADAMS said he wished the chairman of the committee to answer, whether the committee had examined and considered the resolutions of the several States, and the memorials which had been referred to them; or, he wanted to know whether he would take the ground assumed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] and refuse to answer; and the same question he wished to put to every member of the committee present.

Mr. HOWARD said he thought it disrespectful to a committee to ask how they had discharged their duties, and whether they had or had not examined, papers upon which they had reported, to put them, in that way, on trial before the House. He should take the ground of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] and would refuse to answer.

Mr. ADAMS was attempting to proceed, when

The SPEAKER announced the expiration of the morning hour, and was proceeding to the orders of the day, when

Mr. HOPKINS asked the House to take up the motion submitted by him some time since to reconsider the vote of the House by which one branch of a memorial of Francis P. Blair was referred to a select committee.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, objected.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, then moved to reconsider the vote of the House by which the above bill was passed.

Mr. YELL moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. GARLAND, however, claimed the right to address the House, and—

The CHAIR decided the motion must lie over, unless the rules were suspended.

Mr. YELL then moved a suspension of the rules, but the House refused, and consequently the motion, together with the bill, lies over.

At a subsequent stage of this day's proceedings, Mr. GARLAND withdrew the motion to reconsider, and the amendments made to the bill were then sent to the Senate for the concurrence of that body.

The CHAIR then announced the private orders.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that he was informed by the chairman of the committee that it was then three months since the calendar of the Committee of Claims had been touched, and he thought it high time that something should be done with it.

The CHAIR suggested to the House the great saving of time that would result from proceeding regularly with the calendar of business (agreed! agreed! from all parts of the House)

The bill for the relief of the heirs of John Peyton Harrison, on its third reading, coming up, was opposed by Messrs. HALL and WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and supported briefly by Messrs. TALIAFERRO, CRAIG, and UNDERWOOD.

Mr. CUSHING demanded the previous question, saying that such debates on an individual bill, tended to embarrass the transaction of private business, and he wished to proceed with the private calendar.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question being ordered, was then put and disagreed to.

So the bill was rejected

The "bill for the relief of the representatives of Captain Thomas Triplett" was postponed, on motion of Mr. TALIAFERRO, to give time for the production of additional testimony, to the first Monday in December next.

The "bill for the relief of the heirs of Col. George Gibson," was postponed till Friday next, on motion of Mr. McCLURE.

The "bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Col. Francis Vigo," was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved its indefinite postponement: lost.

Mr. BOON remarked that a more meritorious claim, in his opinion, had never been brought to the attention of Congress, and he made an earnest appeal in behalf of it.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays on its passage; which being ordered, were—yeas 103, nays 59.

So the bill was passed.

The joint resolution for the relief of the heirs at law of Frederick M. Bell, deceased, and

The "bill for the relief of the heirs of William Vawter" was postponed till this day week.

The "bill for the relief of the representatives of John B. Ashe," the interest being stricken out, was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The "bill for the relief of the representatives of Nathaniel Irish" was taken up.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved to recommit it to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, which, after some remarks from Mr. T. and Mr. CRAIG, was agreed to.

The "bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Capt. Samuel Jones," the interest being stricken out, was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The following were also ordered to a third reading to-morrow:

The bill for the relief of Josiah Strong and Samuel Remick.

The bill for the relief of James Bailey.

The bill for the relief of Pamela Brown.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Gannett, and

The bill for the relief of Eliza Causin, daughter and heir of Col. John H. Causin, deceased, (the amendments being first concurred in.)

The bill for the relief of Thomas Harrison was taken up, on the report of the Committee of the Whole, to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. TAYLOR caused the report in the case of Major Harrison to be read to the House, and then addressed an extensive argument in support of the claim.

Mr. AYCRIGG had some additional papers read.

Mr. HAMER made an earnest appeal in behalf of Major Harrison, and hoped the House would not concur in the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky opposed the claim, not because he had any objection to the claimant, but to the principle involved in the claim.

At this stage the House took its daily recess till half past 3 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. moved a call of the House, upon which Mr. demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 47, nays 44.

So a call of the House was ordered.

After the roll had been called through,

Mr. MERCER moved to suspend all further proceedings in the call; which motion prevailed.

Mr. MERCER then asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hall of the House of Representatives, between the hours of eight and ten o'clock, a. m. on Tuesday next, be allowed to Dr. Sherwood and Dr. Dwight, for the purpose of explaining and demonstrating the discovery, which the former conceives that he has made, of the laws which regulate the variation of the magnetic needle, and of the means of thence adduning, at any time, by a simple and infallible process, the latitude and longitude of any point of the globe.

The resolution being objected to—

Mr. BRONSON moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of considering it, which motion prevailed without a division.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to amend the resolution, so that it should read Rotunda, instead of Hall, of the House of Representatives, which was not adopted.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he wished to have the resolution amended, so as to allow Dr. Reilly to introduce his brimstone baths.

The SPEAKER requested the gentleman to put his amendment in writing.

Mr. PETRIKIN then submitted an amendment to strike out "from 8 to 10 o'clock," and to insert "from 8 to 9, and from 9 to 10 for Dr. Reilly to use his vapor baths."

Mr. STANLEY moved to amend, by adding a clause that the gentleman should subject himself to the operation, so as to be able to report upon its merits to the House, (some laughter.)

There was considerable difficulty experienced by the Clerk in announcing these amendments to the House, in consequence of the mirth they excited.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said it was evidently impossible for the House to act with propriety upon so grave a subject, and, in order to allow the House to recover its wonted gravity, he moved that the subject be postponed till to-morrow.

The motion to postpone, and the amendments, were rejected, and the resolution was passed.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Harrison being still under consideration.

It was opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, ALLEN, of Vermont, CUSHMAN, HOWARD, and HARLAN,

And was supported by Messrs. WHITTLESEY of Ohio TAYLOR, and LINCOLN.

The question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the enacting clause,

Mr. HARLAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MERCER made some observations; but the reporter could not hear with sufficient distinctness, to tell whether he advocated or opposed the report.

The bill was further discussed, in opposition by Mr. EVANS.

Mr. CUSHING moved the previous question; which was ordered.

And the main question, being on the passage of the bill, was then put, and carried in the negative—yeas 56, nays 97.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD moved an adjournment; which was refused—ayes 55, noes 72.

The bill for the relief Ann S. Heileman, was read a third time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage, and they were ordered.

The bill was opposed by Mr. UNDERWOOD, and supported by Messrs. MASON and THOMPSON.

Mr. McKENNAN demanded the previous question; which was seconded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the yeas and nays, on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and were yeas 109, nays 33.

So the main question was put, and the bill was passed.

On motion,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 15, 1838.

Mr. ROANE presented the memorial of the trustees of the College of Georgetown, D. C. which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of Dr. Sherwood, the inventor of the Geometer, an instrument for discovering the latitude, the longitude, and the variation of the compass, by the dip of the needle; referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, without amendment, the joint resolution in favor of the authorities of the city of Savannah, Georgia; and

On motion of Mr. LUMPKIN, and by general consent, it was read the second and third times, and passed.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of the heir of Edward Buncombe.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported, without amendment, the bills from the House for the relief of Catharine Rollins, otherwise called Catharine Mosely, and Seth Whiting, and recommended their passage; and also reported, without amendment, the following bills, recommending their indefinite postponement:

The bill for the relief of William Smith;
The bill for the relief of Ann Bloomfield;
The bill for the relief of James Francher;
The bill for the relief of John McCormick;
The bill for the relief of Presley Gray;
The bill for the relief of William Harper;
The bill for the relief of Benjamin Price; and
The bill for the relief of Richard Elliott.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Ephraim Sprague, reported the same without amendment.

The bill to incorporate the Navy Yard Beneficial Society of the city of Washington, and

The bill to establish an additional land office in the State of Louisiana, were severally taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LYON, the bill to create the office of Surveyor General of the Public Lands in the State of Michigan, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and after a debate, in which Messrs. MORRIS, LYON, CLAY of Alabama, PRENTISS, NORVELL, KING, WEBSTER, SEVIER, and CLAY of Kentucky, took part,

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was rejected.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate took up the amendments of the House to the bill to change the times of holding the courts of the United States for the ninth circuit; and also, on motion of Mr. G. the Senate disagreed to said amendments.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the Senate took up the amendments of the House to the bill granting the right of preemption to the settlers on the public lands.

Messrs. WHITE and CLAY of Alabama then submitted amendments to the amendments; and, on motion of the latter, they were ordered to be printed, and, with the bill, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the War Department, accompanied by copies of letters from Brigadier General Arbuckle, containing all the information in the Department relative to threatened Indian hostilities on the frontiers of Arkansas: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The bill to authorize the managers of the Washington Monument Society to erect a monument to the memory of George Washington on the public mall, being under consideration,

Mr. ALLEN inquired of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. ROANE] whether he had any information with regard to the means possessed by the society for completing this work.

Mr. ROANE replied that he had been informed that the sum collected by the society was 30,000 dollars, which was put out at interest.

Mr. ALLEN did not profess to have much information on the subject, but he very much questioned whether they had not collected as much as 30,000 dollars in the State of Ohio alone, and when he understood that the sum collected was only 30,000 dollars he was thunderstruck. He thought it due to the country that this thing should be understood. He wished to know how it was that, after ransacking the country from one end to the other, they now came forward with a declaration that they had collected only 30,000 dollars, when, he firmly believed, they had collected more than that sum in his own State.

Mr. ROANE said that he had no further information on the subject than that he had been informed that the sum collected by the society was 30,000 dollars. He had asked what would be the probable expense of the monument, and was informed that it would take about one million of dollars to complete it according to the plan contemplated.

Mr. BAYARD thought that, to erect the monument on the place proposed, would destroy the whole plan of the mall, and that, as far as the prospect was concerned, nothing could be more unfortunate. Besides, the means of the society were very insignificant compared with the object in view; for, as they had agents all over the United States collecting simultaneously, it was to be presumed that they had collected all they were to get.

Mr. NORVELL was apprehensive that the remark of the Senator from Ohio might make an impression injurious to the character or feelings of gentlemen who were officers or directors of the Washington Monument Association. He had not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with more than two or three of them; but he was satisfied that they were incapable of meriting the imputations impliedly, he hoped not intentionally, cast upon them by the Senator from Ohio. He presumed that extensive subscriptions have been made to this work, but not yet collected, and that considerable expense must have been incurred in the employment of agents. As to the location of the site, he could say nothing; but of this he was certain, that such a monument as was proposed ought long since to have been erected to the memory of the illustrious chief, under whose guidance this nation had been led to victory, liberty and independence.

Mr. HUBBARD recollected that when the project of this monument was first commenced, it was contemplated that it was to be completed by the voluntary contributions of the citizens of the United States—the Government having nothing to do with it whatever. He thought that this original plan ought to be fully carried out, and that the President, and the Commissioner of the Public Buildings ought to have nothing to do with it. As to the expense, he said, judging from the cost of the Bunker Hill monument, the $30,000 in the hands of the society would not be enough to lay the foundation.

Mr. MORRIS, in a few words, expressed his concurrence with the views of the Senator from New Hampshire. He thought with his colleague that the public should be informed how it was that so paltry a sum had been collected, after the agents of the society had travelled all over the Union. The State of Ohio he knew had contributed liberally. The county in which he lived was a poor county; and yet it had contributed upwards of $1,000. He himself had brought on several hundred of it to the collector in this city. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NORVELL] was mistaken in supposing that money might have been subscribed, and not paid over. There was no subscription at all. The money must have been paid down before the contributor could have the honor of having his name taken down. There was a sort of enthusiasm on this subject in Ohio. The Governor issued his proclamation in favor of the undertaking, and the sheriffs volunteered as collectors; and, judging from these tokens, the sum collected could not have fell short of $30,000. He agreed with the Senator from New Hampshire that the work should go on without Congress having any thing to do with it. He hoped the bill would be laid on the table.

Mr. ALLEN felt bound to make some reply to the Senator from Michigan. The seemed to suppose that the observations he made might hurt somebody's feelings. He did not care if they did. He did not know a solitary man belonging to this society, and therefore could not speak with a view of injuring them personally. But if telling the truth, and expressing his surprise, that after this perfect crusade through the whole continent, only $30,000 had been collected, hurt their feelings, he did not care about patching them up. But he, for his part, believed in no such story. He considered it a reproach to the liberality of the country—a reproach to that devotion of feeling which every citizen felt for the man who had done so much for his country, and whose memory was so warmly cherished. He knew that in the immediate neighborhood in which he lived, there was not one solitary instance that he heard of, in which application was made to a citizen, man, woman, or child, that a donation had not been promptly given. It was difficult to make the people believe that only thirty thousand dollars had been collected after a perfect crusade through the whole country; and he was opposed to this indirect mode of taxation for the benefit of individuals. He would vote with the boldest hearts here to erect a suitable monument to the memory of the Father of his Country—he would vote a million of dollars; but he considered it a reproach to the country to commence the work with the paltry sum the Society say they have on hand.

We have, said Mr. A. no means of knowing any thing about this matter. It is an out-door business altogether; but as it was brought before the Senate, he thought it due to the country that the representatives of the people should inquire into the circumstances connected with this extraordinary affair, in order to put them on their guard. Sir, said Mr. A. the public men of this country are involved; for they have lent the high sanction of their names to encourage this undertaking. It was an abuse of the names of the honorable and high-minded public men of this country, to say that there was only thirty thousand dollars collected. He wished to see the facts and figures; and if any one felt himself aggrieved, let him make a statement. The public press was open to him. His State contained 79 counties; and if the county in which his colleague resided contributed $1,000 of this $30,000, what is the reason that this county contributed more than any other in the State? And why did Ohio contribute more than all the rest of the Union? In that proportion, there must have been more than a million made up. He hoped that those who felt themselves aggrieved, would give to the public a statement, showing the amount collected in the counties of each State, in order that the people of these counties might know how their money was disposed of; and, said Mr. A. I invite them to do it.

Mr. MORRIS then moved to postpone the bill indefinitely; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of Major General Alexander Macomb; and after some remarks from Mr. H. explaining and advocating the bill,

On motion of Mr. DAVIS,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 16, 1838.

Mr. PETRIKIN, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Abbington Centre to Providence, in Luzerne county, Pennsylvania.

On motion of Mr. CHEATHAM,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Standing Rock post office, Steuart county, Tennessee, by La Grange and Fair Chance Furnaces, to Waverley, Humphreys county, Tennessee; also, the propriety of establishing a mail route the most direct line from Charlotte, Tennessee, to Point Mason, on Tennessee river, from thence to Paris, Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. CLOWNEY,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a route from Union Court House to the Limestone Springs, in Spartansburg district, by the way of Hancockville, South Carolina.

Mr. INGHAM asked leave to submit a resolution, fixing Thursday next for the consideration of some bills of a very important character, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that the gentleman ought to have confidence enough in the House to know that every measure of a public nature would be acted on by it. Mr. C. therefore objected to the resolution, because he objected to any special orders, especially as it was competent for a majority to take up the public business.

Mr. INGHAM replied that he had as much confidence in the House as any one, but he knew very well that it was not every matter of public importance that could always be reached without a special order, moreover, as a number of special orders had already been adopted, he hoped one day, at least, would not be too much to ask for naval bills. He, therefore, moved a suspension of the rules.

Some conversation here ensued as to the order of business, which was arrested by Mr. INGHAM withdrawing his motion for the present.

TEXAS.

The House resumed the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the subject of Texas, as heretofore printed.

Mr. CUSHING had moved, some days since, to recommit the subject, with instructions:

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, moved the following amendment thereto:

Strike out all after the word "instructions," and insert as follows: "To report a joint resolution, directing the President to take the proper steps for the annexation of Texas to the United States, as soon as it can be done consistently with the treaty stipulations of this Government."

Mr. ADAMS, on yesterday, moved the following amendment to the amendment:

Strike out after the word "instructions," and insert: "To report a resolution in the words following: Resolved, That the power of annexing the people of any independent foreign State to this Union, is a power not delegated by the Constitution of the United States to their Congress, or to any department of their Government, but referred to the people; that any attempt by act of Congress, or by treaty, to annex the Republic of Texas to this Union, would be a usurpation of power, unlawful and evil, which it would be the right and duty of the free people of the Union to resist and annul."

Mr. ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded to address the House, and insisted that the refusal of Mr. DROMGOOLE to respond to the inquiry, whether the Committee on Foreign Affairs had read all the resolutions, memorials, &c. against the annexation, was tantamount to an admission that they had not. Mr. A. had intended to prepound the same inquiry to each individual member of the committee, but he would abstain from doing so, as some of the members of that committee might find it difficult to decide between their obligations to duty and party considerations.

Mr. DROMGOOLE interposed, and begged the gentleman to permit every other member of the committee to respond. Mr. D. could assure him that he had had no intercourse nor conversation with them on the subject; but, after the avermen made by the gentleman, Mr. D. did hope he would permit every other member of that committee, whether present at the adoption of the report or not, to answer the gentleman's interrogatory.

Mr. HOWARD joined in the same wish.

Mr. LEGARE was prepared to answer at once; and he admitted that he had never read one of the petitions.

Mr. ADAMS then cited the rule directing the committee that it was their "duty" to take all matters referred to them into consideration, and proceeded to argue that the committee had failed in their duty, without looking into these papers.

Mr. A. repeated, that he should not now interrogate the members of the committee individually, but the gentleman from Virginia might do so if he pleased.

Mr. HOWARD again repeated his wish that the gentleman should do so, and, as far as he might, would insist upon it.

Mr. ADAMS again declined, for the reason above given, and denied that his question, when propounded yesterday, was designed to be personal. His object was to reach the committee as a committee.

M. A. again commented upon the objectionable course of a committee making up its opinion, and sending it forth to the country as its solemn judgment, without examining the materials committed to their examination; and put the case of a committee reporting upon a private claim or old soldier's petition in the same manner. It was a part of that system of contempt for the right of petition, against which he had been long contending and endeavoring to arrest; but the principles assumed by the committee went a step farther even than the House; for, with great solemnity, they received the petitions, but determined not to receive them. He asserted that it was equally their duty, both to receive and to consider. He adverted to the fact that though, for a length of time, the House laid all Texas petitions on the table, yet they at length sent one, thereby expressing its sense that the subject was one requiring the consideration of its committee. The gentleman from Maryland had given it as his opinion that this was an act of inadvertence on the part of the House; for, before that, they were all laid on the table. Mr. A. in reply, adverted to other papers sent since; but had not concluded, when

The CHAIR then announced the orders of the day.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill for the relief of the heirs of Thos. P. Harrison was rejected on yesterday, the further consideration of which was postponed till Friday next.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to lay that motion on the table, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr SHIELDS moved to take up the "Tennessee Land bill," but the House refused—ayes 67, noes 56, not two thirds.

STEAM EXPLOSIONS.

Mr. CUSHMAN also made an ineffectual effort to call up the two bills in relation to steam explosions

Mr. BIDDLE said this was a question of such vital importance, affecting the lives of all who travelled by steam conveyance, that he was compelled to ask for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 121, nays 57.

So the rules were suspended, and the House went into committee, Mr. MERCER in the Chair.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the committee took up the "bill authorizing the appointment of persons to test the usefulness of inventions to improve and render safe the boilers of steam engines against explosions."

The third section of the bill was as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, to carry into effect the foregoing objects, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of six thousand dollars; and so much thereof as shall be necessary for the above purposes shall be subject to their order, to defray such expenses as shall be incurred by their direction, including the sum of three hundred dollars to each for his personal services and expenses: Provided, however, And their accounts shall be settled at the Treasury, in the same manner as those of other public agents.

Mr. CUSHMAN, under instructions of the Committee on Commerce, moved so to amend the section as to give a compensation of eight dollars a day for every day employed, which was agreed to.

The committee then rose and reported the above bill, as amended, to the House, and it then went into Committee on the Union, Mr. MERCER in the chair, on the "bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled, in whole or in part, by steam."

The bill having been read,

Mr. THOMAS submitted an amendment, which was agreed to, and the bill was discussed at length, on its details and principles, by Messrs. THOMAS, CORWIN, RANDOLPH, TILLINGHAST, BIDDLE, HOFFMAN, LEGARE, HAMER, HOWARD, EVANS, and SERGEANT.

Several amendments were offered and voted upon pro forma; but before coming to any final decision,

The House took the usual recess at 2 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

At half past two the SPEAKER took the chair, and the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole [Mr. DAVEE in the chair] on the Steamboat bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to make the bill as perfect as possible before it should be reported. He moved an amendment, the effect of which was to restrict the obligation to keep a fire engine on board the boats, to boats propelled by high-pressure engines. This was intended to create a local distinction between the boats on the Western waters, and those plying between neighboring cities. He did this in accordance with the statements contained in certain memorials upon the subject, which had been sent to the House from New Jersey, &c.

Exceptions to this amendment were taken by Messrs. FILLMORE, MARVIN, and ROBINSON, and it was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON moved the following amendment:

"Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be held to apply to steamboats employed in plying between a port or place in any State to another port or place in the same State, and not engaged in commerce with any foreign nation, or among the several States, or to any persons owning or navigating such steamboat, or employed on board the same"

Mr. R. had no great confidence in the power of legislation to reach this case. But he was willing that all that could be, should be done by Congress, within the limits of their constitutional authority. He offered this amendment to protect the rights of the States against the interference of the Federal Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD made some remarks in opposition to this view of the question, and was replied to briefly by Mr. ROBERTSON. The latter denied the right of Congress to regulate commerce in the different States of the Union.

Mr. SERGEANT proposed an amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. ROBERTSON, so as to render the law applicable to such steamboats as are under the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States.

Mr. POPE begged gentlemen to forget for a moment that they were lawyers, and not file special demurrers, and pleas, and bills of exception, but pass this very important and useful bill, pretty much as it was reported. He showed that this process of holding boats to the jurisdiction of the different States in which they navigate, was likely to be full of embarrassment and difficulty, especially with regard to boats that ply through the waters of several States. He hoped the bill would be passed in the form in which it had been reported.

Mr. BIDDLE and Mr. HAMER opposed the amendment to the amendment very briefly.

Mr. TOUCEY urged that there were three kinds of commerce, with regard to which Congress had a right to legislate: 1st. Commerce with foreign nations. 2d. Commerce between the States; and 3d. Commerce with the Indian tribes. There then was, 4th, commerce within the States, with which Congress had no right to interfere by legislation. He would be in favor of an amendment to this effect; and offered such a one.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said that Congress had long exercised a control over coasting navigation.

Mr. ROBINSON stated that all vessels over 20 tons were subject to the control and legislation of Congress, and sailed under a license imposed by a law of the United States.

Mr. MENEFEE cited the opinion of the Supreme Court in the celebrated case of Ogden vs. Gibbons, in support of those general views of the power of Congress over navigation, as an incident to commerce.

Mr. NOYES suggested that a single line, added to the first section of the bill, so as to restrict the operation of the bill to such vessels as are required to have license under the laws of the United States, would answer all the purposes. And he had read at the Clerk's table an amendment, which, when in order, he would move, to that effect.

Mr. MENEFEE defended and sustained the applicability of the opinion of Judge Marshall, (above cited,) to which he had before referred, to the question under consideration.

Mr. SERGEANT here withdrew his amendment to the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON, in consequence of the mover's accepting the modification proposed by Mr. TOUCEY to the same effect.

Mr. THOMAS would be more willing to support the amendment thus modified, rather than as originally moved. But he thought the whole amendment unnecessary and supererogatory.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied to such objections as had been taken to his amendment.

The amendment was rejected without a count.

Mr. UNDERWOOD adverted to the requisition upon the boats which the bill provides to carry a suction-hose and a fire engine; and he proposed to strike out the ninth suction of the bill, which contains that requisition.

Mr. THOMAS was of opinion that this section ought to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BIDDLE concurred in this view; and the amendment prevailed without a division.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved an amendment, striking out the minimum of the punishment imposed, so as to leave it more discretionary with the court to graduate the punishment to comparatively venial offences; and the amendment prevailed.

Some other verbal amendments were offered, adopted or rejected, on motion of different members.

Mr. CHILDS of New York offered an amendment, which was adopted; and Mr. DUNN and Mr. UNDERWOOD each offered amendments, which were rejected.

Mr. GRAY moved an amendment to the eighth section, so as to name the lakes to which that provision is to apply. The amendment prevailed.

Mr. HAMER moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House; which motion prevailed; and the bill and amendments being reported,

Mr. EVANS moved that the bill and amendments, offered and to be offered, be printed; which motion prevailed.

The House then ordered to a third reading the bill from the Committee of the Whole, to appoint a board to test the practicability of inventions to prevent the explosions of steamboat boilers. The bill was read a third time, and passed.

Several Senate bills were then taken from the Speaker's table read twice, and referred.

Several private bills, on their third reading, where then read, and passed.

Mr MITCHELL moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion (at a quarter past 6 o'clock) prevailed.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, June 16, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented three memorials from sundry citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, requesting Congress, without delay, to pass the Independent Treasury bill: laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported several bills from the House that had been referred to that committee, without amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the bill from the House providing for the settlement of the accounts of Richard Harrison, late commercial agent for the United States in Spain, reported the same without amendment, recommending its passage.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the House making an appropriation for a compilation of the laws passed by the Territorial Legislature of Florida, reported the same without amendment.

The bills from the House for the relief of the heirs of Colonel Francis Vigo, deceased, and for the relief of the heirs at law of Captain Frederick M. Beall, deceased, were severally read twice and referred.

The bill to establish an additional land office in the State of Louisiana, and

The bill to incorporate the Navy Yard Beneficial Society, of the city of Washington, were severally read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to communicate to the Senate the proceedings of a court martial at Gosport, on the case of Captain William Ramsay of the navy.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a Surveyor General's office for the State of Michigan.

Mr. PRENTISS temporarily withdrew his amendment requiring the field-notes and other documents relating to surveys to be deposited, when the duties of the land office should terminate, with the Secretaries of State of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, respectively.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then offered a substitute for the bill, providing for the removal of the present Surveyor General's office for Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, from Cincinnati to Michigan city, in Indiana. Mr. S's substitute also embraced Mr. PRENTISS's above amendment as a second section to the bill.

Mr. NORVELL moved to strike out "Michigan city, in Indiana," from this substitute, and insert Detroit, in Michigan.

This question being divided, the motion to strike out was carried—ayes 17, noes 10.

Mr. NORVELL then withdrew his motion to insert Detroit.

After some remarks from Messrs. TIPTON, LYON, and NORVELL,

Mr. TIPTON moved to fill the blank with the city of St. Josephs.

Mr. ALLEN, after some remarks, proposed to fill the blank with the town of Toledo, in Ohio.

On taking the question, Mr. TIPTON's motion was carried—yeas 27, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, White, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, and Buchanan—4.

Messrs. LYON and NORVELL addressed the Senate in favor of the bill, and contended for the necessity of creating a Surveyor's office for Michigan, and for abolishing such offices as may from time to time become useless.

Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky and LUMPKIN opposed the bill, contending that the office was unnecessary and urging the adoption of the amendment.

After some remarks from Messrs. NORVELL, LYON, SMITH of Indiana, and TIPTON, the question was put on concurring with the amendment as amended, simply requiring the removal of the office from Cincinnati to St. Josephs; and it was lost—yeas 19, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Lumpkin, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tipton, and White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Trotter, Wright, and Young—19.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to lay the bill on the table, with a view to prepare an amendment for abolishing old land offices when no longer required.

This motion was adopted—yeas 36, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown,

Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Trotter, and Young—6.

PRE-EMPTION BILL.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the bill with the amendments referred to them, granting pre-emption to settlers on the public lands, with recommendations that the amendment of Mr. WHITE to the amendment of the House relating to Choctaw reservations be adopted, and that the amendments of the House so amended be then concurred in.

Mr. WHITE's amendment was accordingly agreed to.

At the request of Mr. YOUNG, who expressed a wish slightly to modify one of the amendments of the other House, the bill was temporarily laid on he table, subsequently taken up, the amendments of the House further modified, and concurred in by the Senate.

After which the bill, at the instance of Mr. HUBBARD, was again laid on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Major General Alexander Macomb.

The question at issue on this bill was understood to be whether or not a brigadier-general, being a major-general by brevet, should, when his command merely exceeded a brigade, without amounting to a full division, receive the pay of his brevet rank.

The bill, at much length, was opposed by Messrs. BUCHANAN, CALHOUN, PRENTISS, NICHOLAS, and WHITE, and advocated by Messrs. HUBBARD and STRANGE.

On the question of its engrossment for a third reading, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Clayton, Hubbard, Lyon, Norvell, Preston, Strange, and Tallmadge—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, White, and Young—23.

So the bill was rejected, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, June 19, 1838.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the motion of Mr. HOPKINS to reconsider the vote by which one branch of a memorial of Francis P. Blair was referred to a select committee; and the question of reconsideration being propounded, the vote was, ayes 47, noes 39—no quorum.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio suggested that the subject be postponed for the present, to permit petitions to be presented.

Mr. THOMAS expressed a hope that the House would dispose of this question now. Charges of a grave character had been made against the Editor of the Globe, touching his conduct as a public officer, acting as a printer to this House. His character in other respects had been implicated. Some of these charges, as Mr. T. understood, had been countenanced by statements published in the public journals having the sanction of members of this House. Mr. Blair, the person thus implicated, has appealed to this House to have the truth of these matters inquired into. Mr. T. thought that the House ought forthwith to organize the proper committee, that the subject might be fully examined before the session closed. Such a course was due to the citizen who had appealed to us for justice. It was due to those by whom these charges were made; and to the public, interested in the character of a public press, of wide circulation, and extended influence over public opinion. It was not to be supposed that we should have before us to-day a petition better entitled to our prompt consideration, and there could, therefore, be no good reason for postponing this petition to consider others.

Mr. McKAY made a brief statement of the claim of Blair and Rives, as set forth in the memorial of Mr. Blair.

Mr. FLETCHER of Massachusetts called for the reading of the memorial, which, having been done,

Mr. McKAY proceeded with the statement deduced from the memorial.

Mr. HOPKINS opposed the reference of the proposed branch of the memorial of a select committee, but advocated the reference, if referred at all, to the Post Office committee.

Mr. BRIGGS also contended that the whole subject was within the province, and especially belonged to the duties of the same committee.

Mr. CUSHMAN presuming that every gentleman was prepared to vote, moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. CROCKETT, who said he believed the whole was a manœuvre on the part of the memorialist to get his iniquities white-washed, and therefore Mr. C. wished some reference given to the subject.

Mr. C. then made a statement in reference to the publication of a private letter of his in reply to an impertinent and insulting letter to himself from some individual in Tennessee, whom Mr. C. denounced as destitute of, and lost to, every sense of propriety and common decency. Mr. C. declared that he had stated nothing in that letter which he did not then, and now, believe to be true, with reference to Mr. BENTON's and Mr. CALHOUN's speeches; and he reiterated that hundreds of thousands of "Extra Globes" were sent gratuitously to his district and other parts of the country, franked by public officers of the Government. Mr. C. animadverted still further, with great severity, upon what he termed the "insult" he had received in the letter written to him by the individual in question, who was a member of the Tennessee Legislature, and also upon the general course of the Globe. He concluded, in pursuance of his pledge, by renewing the motion for the previous question.

The motion was seconded by the House, 78 to 57; and the main question being ordered thereon—

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were 105 to 93.

So the motion was reconsidered.

Mr. HOPKINS then moved to refer that portion of the memorial on the post office claim to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and the remainder to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. THOMAS addressed the House for some time in favor of the investigation asked for by the memorialist, as due to the country, to the individual whose conduct had been assailed, and due, also, to those who had brought the allegations. He was, therefore, in favor of a select committee.

Mr. CARTER remarked upon what he termed the extraordinary inconsistency of gentlemen now advocating a reference to a select committee, who had heretofore always opposed such references, even when the standing committees had a vast mass of business before them, whereas now they had got through with most of the subjects under their charge. Mr. C. said that, though he should vote for the reference to a select committee, it was the less necessary on the ground that the main facts were notorious, such as a tariff upon the office-holders, in the way of contributions, to subserve party purposes, and pay for Globes, etc. Mr. S. also stated, among other things, that the public clerks were employed for the purpose of folding and directing speeches and documents, to inundate the country.

Mr. TITUS wished the gentleman from Tennessee to explain. The honorable gentleman had charged the officers of the Government with employing the clerks in the public service to fold documents with which to inundate the country. He desired to know if the gentleman from Tennessee intended to embrace in that charge some two or three hundred thousand of the speeches of Mr. WEBSTER, which had been procured from the city of New York, and ordered by his political friends in Congress to be folded at the public expense, and which had actually been folded at the public expense?

Mr. BOND went into a number of statements of abuses, which he specified, and referred to facts to sustain them.

Mr. CUSHMAN hoped the subject would be fully investigated, and, to test the sense of the House, he demanded the previous question.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, asked the gentleman to withdraw the motion, to enable him to extend the scope of the inquiry to the present printer of the House.

Mr. CUSHMAN at first declined, but subsequently withdrew it, and

Mr. McKAY accepted Mr. GARLAND's instructions as a modification of his motion to refer the subject to a select committee.

Mr. THOMAS made a few remarks in rejoinder to Messrs. CARTER and BOND, when the previous question was seconded—ayes 95, noes 40; and the main question being ordered,

That part of the memorial involving the claim was referred to the Post Office Committee, and that praying for an investigation into the accounts for public printing was not referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures—ayes 89, noes 89, a tie—the CHAIR voting in the negative.

The question recurring on referring this branch of the memorial to a select committee,

Mr. REED asked for the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered.

Mr. REED moved a call of the House: rejected without a division.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana called for a division of the question, so as to divide that of commitment from the instructions; and the vote on reference to a select committee was—yeas 101, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crary, Cushman, De Graff, Dromgoole, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Grant, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Logan, Loomis, James M. Mason, Martin, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Potter, John H. Prentiss, Reily, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Sheffer, Sheplor, Snyder, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, Wm. Graham, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Jenifer, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Legare, Lincoln, Lyon, Marvin, Maury, May, McKennan, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Pope, Potts, Sergeant S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, and Yorke—100.

So that branch of the memorial was referred to a select committee.

[Just as the CHAIR had announced the result, Mr. BEIRNE rose and stated that his name was not recorded, though he was understood to say that he had voted in the affirmative; but it was decided to be too late to make the correction, or allow the gentleman to vote.]

The question was then taken on the instructions, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 195, nay 1.

The committee was ordered to consist of five members.

Mr. GRANT then asked leave to submit a resolution setting apart to-morrow for the consideration of the two harbor bills.

Objection being made—

Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were refused, and the House refused to suspend.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the order of Territories and States, and were presented as follows:

Mr. YELL presented several petitions for Mr. DOWNING of Florida.

By Messrs. HAMER, GOODE, KILGORE, BOND and CHANEY of Ohio.

Mr. KILGORE presented the memorial of a convention of delegates from the banks of Ohio, praying the repeal or modification of the law which prohibits the receipt, in the payment of duties to the Government, of the bills of such banks as have issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars since the 4th of July, 1836, and moved its reference to a select committee.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

This motion having preference under the rules of the House,

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend the motion by instructing the Committee to report a bill in conformity with the prayer of the memorialists.

This giving rise to debate,

The SPEAKER announced that the subject would lie over under the rules.

On motion of Mr. KILGORE, the memorial was then ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee.

[Mr. JOSEPH L. WILLIAMS presented the memorial of a number of the citizens of Knox county, Tennessee, praying Congress to appropriate the public land of the United States within the limits of Tennessee, south and west of the Congressional reservation line, to the improvement of the navigation of those portions of the Holston and Tennessee rivers which are within the limits of said State: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.]

Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina.

Mr. S. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky.

Mr. DAWSON, of Georgia.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Virginia.

Messrs. PETRIKIN, NAYLOR, McKENNAN, POTTER, BEATTY, HAMMOND, and PAYNTER of Pennsylvania.

[Mr. PETRIKIN presented a petition signed by a number of highly respectable citizens of Columbia county, Pennsylvania—one of them a bank director—praying Congress to inquire into the connection of members of Congress with banks, either as stockholders, officers of banks, or debtors to the banks; and moved that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.]

[Mr. HAMMOND presented a memorial from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, requesting the discontinuance of banks as depositories of public funds.]

[Mr. PAYNTER presented three memorials, numerously signed by the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, asking the speedy passage of the Independent Treasury bill: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to which the Independent Treasury bill was referred.]

Mr. YORKE of New Jersey.

Messrs. JONES, TITUS, and HOFFMAN, of New York.

Mr. TOUCEY of Connecticut.

Mr. TILLINGHAST of Rhode Island.

Messrs. CUSHING, GRENNELL, ADAMS, PHILLIPS, LINCOLN, and BRIGGS, of Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Hampshire.

[Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS presented the petition of M. L. Atkinson, and one hundred and sixty-four others students of Dartmouth College to rescind the resolution of the 27th of December, and permit the memorials of the people to be heard.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD of Maine.

The House then took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met at half past three o'clock, according to the order, and went into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill to establish certain post routes and discontinue others.

The sections of the bill were read in order, according to the States in which the routes were located, and various amendments were proposed, of merely local interest, occupying nearly the whole session.

Mr. HOPKINS moved an amendment, appropriating two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars to carry into effect the provisions of the bill.

Mr. H. alluded to the condition of the Post Office Department, and said that owing to the extension of facilities to the country, and the extraordinary embarrassments of the times, it would be impossible to establish new routes from the present resources of the office; and it might even be necessary to discontinue some of those already established, if aid were not granted from the Treasury. He should be opposed to the passage of the bill unless means were afforded to carry it into effect.

Mr. WISE objected to the appropriation, and alluded to the reports of the Postmaster General, with an allegation that they were inconsistent and contradictory. The first report, he said, stated the Department was in debt near half a million of dollars. The second report stated, that, as if by a magic wand, order had been brought out of confusion, and solvency from bankruptcy. The report at the called session, or at the commencement of this one, stated that the Postmaster General could sustain his Department upon his own resources, and that he needed no aid from the Treasury. If all this was true, how could it be that this appropriation was necessary. He was inclined to believe that the Postmaster General was hoarding his resources, to be used for electioneering purposes, and he would not trust this sum of money to him to be used for electioneering purposes; for the application of it to the creation of new post routes was permissory, and not obligatory.

The debate was briefly and incidentally continued till a quarter past eight o'clock, when, without coming to any decision, the committee rose and reported progress; and

The House adjourned.

COMMITTEE ON THE PETITION OF F. P. BLAIR.

Mr. McKAY.
HOPKINS.
THOMAS.
HAMER.
HOFFMAN.

The following is the order under which the above committee was appointed:

Ordered, That so much of the memorial of Francis P. Blair, as invites a scrutiny of all his accounts for work executed for Congress and the public offices, be referred to a select committee with instructions to inquire into the manner in which the public printing for Congress and the Executive Departments has been executed; whether the same has been done conformably to law; and whether any and what change can be made for the public good.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 18, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented six memorials from the citizens of Philadelphia county and city, urging the propriety of immediately passing the Sub-Treasury bill, and manifesting a strong indisposition to the establishment of a United States Bank: laid on the table.

Mr. B. also presented a petition from sundry citizens of Philadelphia, praying that no international copy right law may be passed: referred to the Committee on Patents.

Also, a petition from certain citizens of the District of Columbia, praying that a diplomatic agent may be sent to Hayti, and commercial regulations entered into with that Republic: laid on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of the widow of Roger Alden, of the Revolutionary army, praying a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Don Carlos Dehault Delassus, late Spanish Lieutenant Governor of the district of Baton Rouge, in West Florida, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Sho-ba-nies, a Pottawatamie Indian, asking confirmation of a grant of land: concurred in.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the legal representatives of —— Lathrop, without amendment.

Mr. PRENTISS moved to recommit the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of James H. Bradford, which had been adversely reported on; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the resolution of the Legislature of Arkansas, praying the passage of a law authorizing patents to be issued for lands confirmed under Spanish grants, was instructed by said committee to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the same; which was concurred in.

Mr. TALLMADGE asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to bring in a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases. He had hoped that the Committee on the Judiciary would have presented a bill for that purpose, but he was aware that there might be a difference of opinion as to its adoption. He alluded to the strange anomaly which existed on this subject in New York; where, though the citizen is exempt from imprisonment for debt by the laws of the State, he is incarcerated under process from the United States courts, and where the subject has been deemed worthy the presentment of a grand jury. Mr. T. appealed to the Senate to unite with him to wipe this foul blot from the statute books of the nation.

Mr. GRUNDY, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, expressed his willingness to act on it with as little delay as possible. He felt strongly inclined to favor the measure, though the consent of the Senate might be obtained to act on it without a reference. The bill was short, and provided only for those States where imprisonment for debt was already abolished.

The "bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases" having been read,

Mr. TALLMADGE said some Senators had suggested that it had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill was accordingly referred.

The North Eastern Boundary question was then called up by Mr. BUCHANAN, who addressed the Senate at length, and was followed by Messrs. DAVIS and WILLIAMS.

At five o'clock the Senate went into Executive session, and then Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, June 19, 1838.

Petitions were, on leave, presented by Mr. ADAMS and Mr. FRY.

[Mr. FRY presented sundry memorials from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, very numerously signed, praying for the passage of the Independent Treasury bill. Said memorials were, on Mr. F's motion, committed to the same Committee of the Whole to which was committed the said bill, and ordered to be printed.]

TEXAS.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to submit a resolution calling on the President for certain resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi.

Objection being made, Mr. A. moved a suspension of the rules, on which the vote was—yeas only 55, so that the motion did not prevail.

Mr. A. then made a request to the delegation from Mississippi for a copy of the paper.

Mr. A. resumed his remarks on the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the subject of Texas, under the motions to recommit with instructions as given in Saturday evening's Globe. Mr. A. continued during the residue of the hour, and gave way, without concluding, to the call by Mr. CAMBRELENG for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, transmitting a report of the expenditures on the Treasury building during the past year.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the consideration of the "bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue."

Mr. SERGEANT moved the "harbor bill;" which, he said, it was very important should be acted upon. It would not, he believed, consume much time.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that it must be obvious that the bill he had moved, being the only debatable measure remaining for the present, had better be disposed of first, after which the regular business might be proceeded with.

The question being taken on the first motion, by tellers, and there being 132 voting for it, more than a majority of the whole House, the "Independent Treasury bill" was accordingly taken up, and having been read through by the Clerk,

Mr. CAMBRELENG, who was of course entitled to the floor, gave way, at his request, to

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, who moved the following substitute:

Strike out all after the words, "Be it enacted," etc. and insert: "That all dues to the Government shall hereafter be collected in gold and silver coin, Treasury notes of the United States, and the notes of sound specie-paying banks under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by act of Congress, or by the Secretary of the Treasury; Provided, That no bank notes shall be received as aforesaid, except such as the bank of deposite shall agree to receive and credit as cash.

2. Be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to select as special depositories of the public funds, and at such places as may be necessary, sound specie-paying banks, preferring, in all cases where such exist, banks owned in whole or in part by the States in which the same are situated.

3. Be it further enacted, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to contract with the banks selected as depositories aforesaid, for the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, on such terms, and for such compensation, as he may deem right and proper; stipulating in all cases, under such guaranties as he may think necessary, that the public funds deposited with said banks shall be in no case used in their business, nor otherwise used but in payment of drafts from the Treasury.

Mr GARLAND of Virginia then said he would, with leave of the gentleman from New York, submit a motion which, without the resort to any amendment or substitute, would test the sense of the House on the merits of the bill. He moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. C. said he would not detain the committee long, as the bill under consideration was accompanied by a detailed report on its provisions and principles. Indeed, any extensive argument in support of the measure had been rendered unnecessary by recent events, which had swept away almost every material objection hitherto urged against it.

The Sub-Treasury, as it is called, or the collection, keeping, and disbursement, of the public revenue by our own officers, was established by the suspension of the banks in May, 1837. When we assembled in September last, it was proposed to regulate the Treasury by particular laws applicable to its actual condition. The measure was immediately and fiercely resisted as an alarming innovation, calculated to ruin trade, destroy the banks, and to break up the foundations of civil society. Such was the panic language uttered here during the late extra session, and spread throughout the land. This desolating measure, the Sub-Treasury, has now been in full operation for more than thirteen months. Trade has recovered from the lowest point of depression, confidence is restored, and the banks have resumed specie payments at the very places where the largest portion of our revenue is collected, and where the Treasury is most powerful. The arguments and predictions of gentlemen are thus triumphantly refuted and contradicted.

Notwithstanding these satisfactory results, it is still attempted to excite the fears of those who are engaged in trade. The mere idea of debating the question is made a subject of alarm, the press encourages the most fearful apprehensions, the stock exchange is in commotion, and the banks, after promising resumption, are suddenly arrested. And what is the foundation for all this commotion and alarm? How can it possibly affect the trade or banks of the country, whether Congress should or should not regulate by particular laws, a system which is already established by a few general laws, and which must in any event be continued for years to come? Suppose we reject this bill, and go home, does the Sub-Treasury cease? No, sir, it must continue, as it is now, the law of the land, and will continue through 1838, '39, '40, and '41, in spite of all the lamentations here or elsewhere.

The non-resuming banks are especially alarmed. But a short time since the passage of the bill repealing the Specie Circular, was hailed as a measure removing the last difficulty to the resumption of the banks generally. Another circular appeared, and they were suddenly arrested in their progress to resumption. This circular embraced nothing but the provisions of the laws of 1836, and made no change, except what was required by the act repealing the Specie Circular. The same instructions were, in pursuance of that law, given to every receiving and collecting officer throughout the Union. The circular directs, what the law requires, that no notes shall be received but those which are redeemable in specie at the place where they are received. This has been our uniform practice, under every system, and it is not probable we shall ever repeal that regulation. It also directs, in obedience to the act of April, 1836, that no note shall be received of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

It is a matter of little moment to the banks whether one thousand and millions of revenue are collected in their notes of twenty dollars and upwards, so long as their notes are receivable for public dues. There is but one provision which can affect any of the banks, and that is the restriction in the act of June, 1836, which prohibits the receipt of the notes of any bank which has issued, since the 4th July, 1836, any bill or note of a less denomination than five dollars. It happens, unfortunately for the Bank of the United States, and most of the other banks acting in concert with that institution, that their notes are not excluded by this provision in the act of 1836. On the contrary, while these banks would, if they resume, enjoy this special privilege, the notes of almost all the banks which have already resumed cannot be received. So far, then, as the recent circular operates at all, the Bank of the United States and its associates have every inducement to resume, in order that their notes may be received in payment of public dues, while the notes of other banks are excluded.

But, it seems, these non-resuming banks can do nothing till they know the fate of this bill. Why, sir, if all the complaint is that the law, as it stands, prohibits the receipt of the notes of banks which have issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars, they should anxiously desire the passage of the bill; for one of its provisions effectually repeals the restriction in the act of 1836, and authorizes the receipt of the notes of all specie paying banks immediately, and for a time, and chiefly in such notes for years to come. That is the only provision of the bill which can possibly affect the question of resumption. The other provisions, so far as they relate to the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the revenue, are substantially now in force, and must remain so until we substitute bank agents for our own officers, which no one now contemplates. The defeat of this bill cannot, therefore, affect any of the banks, except unfavorably, as it would leave the restriction of the act of 1836 unmodified and unrepealed. But neither its passage or defeat can in any manner affect the Bank of the United States, as the existing restriction does not exclude the notes of that institution, whenever it may resume specie payments.

Whatever course, sir, the banks may think proper to pursue, it is our duty to supply the deficiency in our laws regulating our Treasury. That Department has been left, for more than a year, acting under the authority of a few ancient laws, and the Secretary has been necessarily compelled to provide by Treasury Orders for the collection, keeping, and disbursement of our revenue. I am unwilling to believe that a majority of either House are disposed longer to leave so large a discretion to any public officer. It must be obvious to every gentleman that no material modification of our existing revenue system can be anticipated, if ever, until 1842; and it remains for us to decide whether Congress, or the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, for four years to come, provide all the regulations necessary in the operations of that most important Department of our Government.

There is no prospect, at present, of any material change in our existing system of managing our revenue. No Bank of the United States can be chartered, if at all, for four years to come, and the State bank deposite act has nullified itself. By that act, no bank can be employed as a deposite bank which has, since the 4th July, 1836, issued or paid out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars. What bank is there in the United States, whether of issue or not, which has not, during the suspension, "paid out" a bill or note of a less denomination than five dollars? No such system can be revived until that restriction is repealed, and any such proposition would certainly be rejected. Even if new banks are established, it cannot be supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury, after what has occurred, would feel himself authorized to employ any bank, without requiring ample security in actual funds, immediately available in any emergency, and equal to any amount which might at any time remain in deposite. Nor is it probable that he would consider it a faithful or just compliance with the law, to re-establish a State bank deposite system for some States, while all the others were under Treasury regulations, thus giving to the banks in one section the profits on the use of the public money, contrary to the design of the act. None but a general State bank deposite system, if any, can be adopted, and such would require, if ever proposed, a thorough revision of the late law.

So far then, as it regards the question of bank agency, it must be considered as postponed, at least, till the time may arrive when both Houses of Congress and the Executive accord in opinion—a harmony which has not often existed for many Administrations past, and of which there is no chance whatever till 1842, even if it should then happen.

The next question relates to the receipt of bank notes in payment of public dues. I trust we are not about, from mere opposition to this particular measure, to run into the opposite extreme, and, as some gentlemen propose, make permanent provision for receiving the notes of specie paying banks, of every denomination whatsoever. On this question a very large majority of both Houses have hitherto adopted sound principles—they have been hard money men; and this is certainly not a time when either House should abandon on this important question any ground previously occupied. One of the propositions which has been repeatedly made at the present session in both Houses, is to repeal the 2d section of the act of 14th April, 1836, viz:

"That, hereafter, no bank note of a less denomination than ten dollars, and that from and after the 3d day of March, anno Domini eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, no bank note of a less denomination than twenty dollars, shall be offered in payment in any case whatsoever in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department; nor shall any bank note, of any denomination, be so offered, unless the same shall be payable, and paid on demand, in gold or silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him; Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to make any thing but gold or silver a legal tender by any individual, or by the United States."

From the moment the receipt of bank notes was tolerated in payment of public dues, this regulation should have been adopted as a special duty of the Federal Government, whatever laws the States and trade might prescribe for themselves. The Constitution has assigned to us the care of the current coin of the country, and our Federal revenues should never have been made instrumental in circulating notes of a denomination which banished that coin from circulation. No such regulation was ever necessary, either to trade or banks; nor is there any reason whatever for now repealing the section in question. On the contrary, there are stronger reasons than ever for its continuance. When it was sent to this House by the Senate in 1816, so little was it regarded as a party question, a gentleman of the Opposition moved that it should go into immediate operation. His motion was rejected, but the gentleman was right. There was no reason then for postponing it a day, nor is there now for suspending it an hour. Receive the notes of specie paying banks if you please, for all your large payments for customs and lands, but do not make the Federal Government instrumental in excluding the current coin from our circulation, by constituting it the agent of the banks in enlarging their issues of small notes. The section besides contains other and important provisions, limiting the receipt of bank notes to those redeemable in specie and on the spot. I trust that it will remain the law of the land as long as the receipt of bank notes is tolerated, as a measure indispensable to the security of the revenue, and essentially contributing to the soundness of the currency.

It is also proposed to modify or repeal the provision in the act of June, 1836, prohibiting the receipt of the notes of any bank which has, since the 4th July, 1836, issued any bill or note of a less denomination than five dollars. That object will be accomplished if this bill becomes a law. The 20th section, together with the last, repeals this restriction. This provision of the bill is, however, the one most violently opposed, because it proposes, at the end of six years, to dispense with the receipt of bank notes altogether. No language can express the abhorrence which some gentlemen entertain towards this abominable and barbarous specie section. Yet it so happens, strange as it may seem, that gentlemen themselves have been guilty of a much more atrocious act of treason against the banks than any ever attempted by the friends of the Administration. There was an important provision in the celebrated currency bill of 1837, which passed both houses by overwhelming votes, and was so great a favorite here, that the rule was suspended, the previous question ordered, and the bill passed without debate. In that bill will be found the following provision:

"From and after the passage of this act, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be received on account of the public dues; from and after the thirty-first day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the notes of no bank which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, shall be so receivable; and from and after the thirty-first day of December, eighteen hundred and forty-one, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing or circulating bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars."

Gentlemen may say this was under other circumstances, and before the banks suspended specie payments. What was wise then might be otherwise now. What will they say when they learn that this identical provision, word for word and letter for letter, was voted for in the Senate of the United States on the third day of October last, during the extra session, by every member of the Opposition, and by every Conservative? And what was this proposition? Why that from and after the thirty-first day of December, 1841, the notes of no bank shall be received for public dues which issued or circulated any bill or note of a less denomination than twenty dollars. In other words, the revenue was after that date to be collected exclusively in specie, or in evidences of public debt; for such would have been the inevitable result if gentlemen had succeeded in their own efforts to establish, what they are pleased to denominate, an exclusive metallic currency. There is not a bank in the Union which would have discontinued, so long as they were permitted to do so, the issuing and circulating bank notes of a denomination less than twenty dollars, merely to secure the privilege of having their notes received in payment of public dues, and redeemable in specie on the spot. What, then, is the difference between this proposition and that in this bill, which has been denounced as so disastrous in its effects? None substantially or practically, except that the proposition of gentlemen would have gone into ful, operation, and excluded bank notes, two years earlier than the period proposed in this bill. Indeed, four years earlier; for the ten dollar provision, which was to take effect on the 31st of December, 1839, would have effectually excluded the notes of every bank in the Union. It is not a little singular that the most moderate measure should excite the abhorrence and alarm of the same gentlemen who twice voted for the other, and denounced the late President for retaining the bill containing this identical hard-money provision.

We are imperatively called upon to adopt some measure, at this time, whether it be permanent or merely temporary. Of the various propositions submitted at this and the late session, none have as yet commanded a majority of both Houses. The special deposite system cannot obtain the support of either party. The State bank plan, so recently exploded, as an independent proposition, would not receive fifty votes in this House. The only measure which is now, or will be hereafter, supported as the antagonist of that now under consideration, is a National Bank. That has already been decided against by a large majority of this House, and has been rejected in the Senate by a much larger vote. The Independent Treasury, then, though it may not be sustained by a majority of this House, is undoubtedly preferred, both here and elsewhere, to either of the measures proposed. Are we, then, under such circumstances, to do nothing, and leave our Treasury wholly at the discretion of the Secretary for four years to come? I trust not. The bill under consideration proposes to limit his discretion, and define his duties. It also provides additional security for the public revenue, new checks upon our public officers, and many financial regulations which should have been long since adopted. As to the specie section, its operation is gradual, and will be imperceptible. Why, then, reject this bill, and leave the Treasury wholly unregulated? Why substitute Treasury orders for legal provisions?

Why is it that gentlemen who are so jealous of Executive discretion; who denounce the late President for alleged usurpation, and who are daily arraigning the Secretary of the Treasury for his circulars—why is it that they refuse to co-operate with us in prescribing the duties of the Secretary, and of every other officer connected with the reveuue? There can be but one answer. If this bill passes, agitation will cease; we shall hear no more of Treasury circulars; the banks must resume specie payments; exchanges will be adjusted, and the country will prosper without the agency of a National Bank. It is in vain to disguise the matter. Those who honestly believe that without such an institution this country never can flourish, and that without consolidation this Government cannot stand, consider a few years of embarrassment to trade a sacrifice of little moment when compared with those permanent blessings which, in their opinion, would follow their triumph. The opposition to this measure is obviously preparatory to the great struggle in which we are about to engage. We are already furnished with the outline of a national institution, or rather plan of Government, more formidable than any hitherto projected. A bank of fifty millions, owned by the Federal Government, the States and capitalists—a union of seven-and-twenty Executives with the banking interest of the country—the concentration and consolidation of all political and moneyed power. To accomplish these great ends, we must postpone this measure from session to session, and leave our Treasury wholly unregulated. For such purposes are we invited to debate this question for two years to come, to benefit the leading members of the stock exchange and their political associates. I trust that a majority of this House will not be influenced by any such considerations. We have already decided against every other measure; and whether we reject or pass this bill, our revenue system remains unaltered. We merely substitute the will of Congress for Treasury discretion, and leave nothing to Executive power which can be regulated by law.

Mr. PICKENS then obtained the floor, and addressed the House till the hour for taking the recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met at half-past three, pursuant to the order.

Mr. PICKENS concluded his remarks upon the subject of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia then obtained the floor, but stating that the subject had come up suddenly, and that he was not prepared, he requested that the committee should rise, and indulge him till to-morrow.

After some conversation upon the order of business, the committee rose, and reported progress.

Upon motion of Mr. WHITE of Kentucky, the House then went into Committee of the Whole upon the post route bill.

The amendment of Mr. HOPKINS, with an amendment proposed thereto by Mr. UNDERWOOD, being under consideration,

Mr. UNDERWOOD briefly went into an argument to show that the proposed new routes could be established, without any extraordinary appro priation.

Mr. REED expressed his desire to grant every facility to the country which could be done without encroachment upon the Treasury. He referred to some topics upon which he wished more information, and alluded to the express mail as an accommodation to speculators, not generally useful to the people, and he thought it an extra expense that might be dispensed with.

Mr. MONTGOMERY replied in relation to the express mail. It had not been brought directly before the committee, though they had thought of the expediency of abolishing it. That mail had only existed upon great commercial routes, and it had facilitated the transmission of intelligence; but as soon as railroad and steamboat communication had been established, that mail had been abolished. He did not know but he would go to dispense with it altogether, as the expense had been some hundred and fifty thousand dollars more than the income.

Mr. POPE went into some considerations in favor of the bill, and appealed to the committee not to embarrass the bill by objecting to trifles, as it was important, particularly for the West, that it should be passed. If the amendment was objectionable, he hoped it would be rejected, and that the bill would be passed.

Mr. YELL thought the principle had been, from the first, to make the Post Office Department support itself from its own funds. This principle had been, in some instances, departed from, and he was willing to make a contingent appropriation, so that the Postmaster General might have a discretionary power to use it or not as might be necessary. He did not wish that the little necessary accommodation for the West should be withheld; but he would prefer that such routes as were requisite should be maintained there, and that some great routes in the interior, and upon the seaboard, should be so cut down as to keep the expenditure within reasonable bounds. Unless some appropriation was made, it would be necessary to cut down some of the routes in the old States, or refuse routes in the West which are absolutely necessary.

Mr. MARTIN contended that it was idle, and would be futile, to pass the bill without t e amendment. He would not go into the statistics of the office, but it was stated by the Postmaster General that the funds available to the Department were not adequate to the call made by the proposed new routes. It was, therefore, proper to supply funds from other resources, or to reject the bill. He contended for the necessity of establishing the routes proposed, and objected to the curtailment proposed by Mr. YELL. He did not wish to have any curtailment in these facilities for the accommodation of the people.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. HALL, GOODE, MERCER, BRIGGS, MONTGOMERY, YELL, and CALHOON.

After which the amendments were adopted, and the committee rose and reported the bill to the House.

And at a quarter past seven,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 19, 1838.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Navy Department, in obedience to a Senate resolution of the 16th instant, with a copy of the proceedings of the naval court martial held at Gosport, on the case of Captain William Ramsay, and with the subsequent correspondence: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS said that he arose for the purpose of asking the indulgence of the Senate, an indulgence which, on former occasions, had been granted to members in noticing paragraphs in public prints which impugned either their honesty or honor as members of this body. He found in one of the morning papers of the city, the National Intelligencer, a publication, under the editorial head, censuring the course which his colleague and himself had deemed it their duty to take with regard to the bill proposing to grant leave to a society, or company of gentlemen who have united together, to erect a monument to the memory of Washington upon a portion of the public ground in this city.

Mr. M. said he did not rise in defence of himself, for he did not consider that his individual or political standing with his constituents depended, in the least degree, on any lying spirit which might be found in the mouth of the prophets of this modern Ahab. Frail as his claim on public favor might be, he was unwilling to trust it to such guidance; for, like their great prototype, these followers generally found the end of their path destructive to their hopes. But when his conduct here as a Senator was implicated, it reached further than himself; it affected those who sent them; and he felt it a duty which he owed to them to correct such misstatements as the paper before him contained. The editors had asserted that the two Senators from Ohio thought fit to hazard some very serious imputations against the managers of the Monument Association. This charge, though made in the nature of an insinuation, he said, was unfounded in fact, and untrue in its deductions. Him nor his colleague (who he was glad to see about taking his seat) had made no imputations against the managers. For himself, he did not know who they were, or whether there were managers at all. He had spoken only of the money which it seemed the society or their agents had received, and of the impropriety of connecting the Government with the abstractions or speculations of companies or mere private individuals. What, then, did he hazard, or what imputation did he make? No specific allegation is made in this publication as to the charge he is said to have made, because there was no foundation on which it could rest. It would be remembered by the Senate that when the bill was called up by the honorable chairman on the District business, [Mr. ROANE,] that his colleague inquired if any information had been furnished the committee as to the amount of funds the society had collected for the purpose; and we were informed that $30,000 was the sum stated. His colleague, as well as other members, felt surprised at the smallness of the sum, when it was a well known fact that the collecting agents of the society had traversed every portion of the United States, for the purpose of soliciting and receiving donations; his colleague had suggested his doubts as to the correctness of the information that $30,000 only had been received, and had stated, at some length, his reasons for such doubts; his colleague believed that more than that sum had been collected in Ohio alone; he concurred in this opinion, because he had understood from the same source that upwards of $1000 had been paid or subscribed by the people of his own county. The object of his colleague and himself was to obtain information on the subject, and he stated expressly that, if in error, he wished that error to be corrected from authentic documents, and on that account he objected to the bill until it was clearly shown how much money had been taken up, and to what use it had been applied. This suggestion, made for the purpose of information, is construed into hazarding imputations against the managers; but the article does not stop here. The editors have quoted a paragraph without giving credit to any paper, and he, Mr. M. had the right to consider this adopted child of the editors' as their own, and for which they were willing to be answerable. In that quotation, it is stated that "Messrs. MORRIS and ALLEN of Ohio, indirectly, and yet quite positively, charged the managers of the association with swindling; they said that they had accounted for $30,000 only when it was an ascertained fact that more than that amount had been collected in Ohio alone." This is not any thing like a true and correct representation of what he said, but is a misrepresentation both groundless and false; he had stated his opinion only as to what had been collected in his own county; a county which might be considered almost third rate in wealth and means; yet he believed that county had contributed liberally, and if a fair sample of the rest of Ohio, he had no douht of the correctness of his colleague's opinion. The reason why he believed a liberal contribution had been taken up in Ohio, was that the Governor of the State had given notice by way or form of proclamation, that money was required for the erection of the contemplated monument, and was to be collected by contribution. The people were half inclined to believe the requirement legal, and as the Sheriff of his county had been charged with, or undertaken the collection, money was given without much inquiry. The sheriff had forwarded by him [Mr. M.] a sum of money which he had paid over in this city to some gentleman who he believed called himself agent, or some such official name; but in his county it was not mere subscriptions, as he understood the game, but the actual money was paid, and the name of the donor taken down, who was told that the names of all who contributed would be inscribed on a roll, and preserved in the monument. It was this extraordinary mode of levying contributions upon the people, under the influence of the name of WASHINGTON, that first drew his attention to the subject. He doubted then, and he still doubted, whether this money would ever be disposed of or applied, according to the intention of the donors; but he had viewed it as a mere private concern—one of those numerous devices for raising money, with which the country is almost literally inundated. But it is now attempted to engraft it upon the action of Congress; and he insisted that it was the duty of the managers, before they made this attempt, to have shown the actual state of their funds, and in what manner, and from whom, the same had been collected. He was not willing, for one, to attach the honor of his country to a scheme which, for aught he knew, might have been carried on by means of deception and fraud. Yet this reasonable request had been trumpeted by the morning paper as making a grave charge, or at least as casting imputations. All he said, he had stated at the time, was from information, and he yet believed the same to be correct, and he should continue to believe so until the public is furnished with full, clear, and satisfactory accounts from authentic documents on the subject. But sir, (said Mr. M.) to avoid all misrepresentations as to what he now said, (though he was well convinced that was a vain hope,) he would again read the paragraph. [Here Mr. M. read the paragraph alluded to.] And he would now ask if the representatives from a sovereign State are to be thus charged with having made an unfounded imputation, which the paper before him asserts, and which in the abundance of its patriotism in money matters, it undertakes to reprove, without furnishing the least evidence to the contrary of the suggestions made; and without any explanation, on his part, suffer this charge to go to the world? He thought not.

Sir, said Mr. M. the remarks of my colleague, as well as those made by himself, seem to be a bitter pill to certain gentlemen who are wishing to connect the aid and influence of the Government to their (as yet concealed) private undertakings; he was glad the dose was beginning to operate, and he hoped it would cause the contents to be thrown up to public view; and those who had been roaming over the country making collections, or had been the means of making such collections, might disgorge their ill-gotten wealth, if what he feared should turn out to be true. He had no idea of using the mantle of Government, like the mantle of charity, "to cover a multitude of sins."

But, sir, said Mr. M. we have another beautiful specimen of the kindly feelings of the gentlemen engaged in this monumental affair, towards the Senate, as well as towards the Administration itself. This precious production is over the signature of "G. Watterson, Secretary," and states as a direct charge, that the Senate of the United States has refused to grant a small portion of the public ground, within the city, necessary for a site for a monument to the Father of his Country. Who this G. Watterson, Secretary, is, he said, he did not know, nor did he care; with him as an individual he had no concern whatever. This notice he considered as the act of the Board of Managers; it was, he presumed, issued by their authority, and he still considered it a libel on the Senate. He would not, however, enter into any comparison between the patriotism of the Senate and their regard for the fame of WASHINGTON, and this monumental Board of Managers. He said it was evident to his mind that the object and design of this publication was to produce political effect. It was well known that a majority of the Senate were the friends of the present Administration, and if this article could impress the public mind with the belief that those who sustained the Administration had no regard for the memory of WASHINGTON, he had no doubt it was expected it would tend to promote individual and party views. It was a kind of left handed blow to injure the Administration and its friends in the Senate, by charging them with meanness in refusing to accede to the wishes of the society. Al such attempts he viewed as springing from unworthy motives, and they are most commonly made by men who have been turned out of official stations for some unworthy act. But he feared there was another motive, besides veneration for the name of WASHINGTON, that prompted the agents and managers of this project to be so ardent in their endeavors to link themselves and scheme to the public concerns of the country. They were reported as having thirty thousand dollars only. This sum they could easily expend in the foundation, or even the first corner stone, of the monument. They could devise a plan for the superstructure that would require millions for its completion; and if they could make this affair a Government concern, they would insist, no doubt, that the country would be disgraced if the building was not completed; and Congress would be solicited and urged to made appropriations for the purpose, by all the force of speech and the blandishments of parties. Millions would be thus called for, and, in his opinion, appropriated, if the scheme now in operation can succeed, to be expended by a private corporation, whose dependants, friends, and followers would grow rich in the progress of the work. I; was imputing nothing to say this might be the case for it would be found, he believed, in every instance in which the Government had undertaken to enter into any kind of partnership with either companies or individuals, Uncle Sam was sure to bear the expense, let who might reap the profits. He was totally averse to the Government having any thing to do in this matter, or any other in which individuals were also to be concerned as partners. It was this that induced him to move the postponement of the bill.

The charge in the last paragraph which he had read, as to the refusal of the Senate "to grant a small portion of public ground," &c. he thought came with an ill grace from a body of men who had made no exhibition nor furnished any data by which the amount of money in their hands could be ascertained. The charge against him was publicly made, and he had a right to ask the society to make a public exhibition of their books, papers, and proceedings, that we might be able to judge whether its own claim to purity was or was not well founded, and to show that no part of the donations made was still sticking to their fingers, or found in the palms of the hands of some who had received money on this account, before their friends undertook to censure others for asking for information. When the Society had voluntarily solicited the notice of Congress, they ought at least to show that all concerned in this business had clean hands. But why, sir, do these gentlemen ask the interference of Congress in any manner whatever? The enterprise was begun for individual glory, for the purpose of obtaining an imperishable renown, by the coupling their names with that of Washington. At least this was urged to induce contributions in his county; and he would not, by any act of his, rob gentlemen of this glory which they hoped to acquire; nor would he aid them to acquire glory which they did not deserve. He would have them to pursue that course which their judgments should direct; and were he engaged in the concern, it would be his last thought to apply to the Government for leave to erect it on public ground. He would not expose a monument of this kind to the dangers which public strife might produce. But, sir, said Mr. M. I do not believe we are sent here to enter into any scheme for the erection of monuments, by which the public moneys may be voted to be expended, under the direction of this, or any other society. Nor would he ever give his vote to connect the Government with any private association whatever. His colleague had said that for the Society to say that only $30,000 had been collected or subscribed, was a libel on the American people; for every portion of the country had been traversed by agents for this purpose; and he repeated again, that the charge made in this veritable paper, as it claims to be, against the Senators from Ohio, was groundless and false.

Mr. ALLEN observed that he saw this morning in the National Intelligencer the publication which had formed the subject of his honorable colleague's remarks. He knew that it would be very useless for a public man to engage in controversies with the conductors of the public press, and perhaps it would be wrong to do so; because whilst there was here almost an unlimited scope allowed to the discussions of members, he should be very unwilling to restrain the press. He was glad that his colleague had noticed the publication in the Intelligencer in the manner he did, because they could by this means correct the errors of the Intelligencer. If the editors of that paper meant to say that he and his colleague had charged the managers of this society with fraud, they did them injustice. If they meant to say that he and his colleague had charged any body with fraud, they did them equal injustice. The sum total of what was said by his colleague and himself was this: A bill was before the Senate to allow the managers of the Washington Monument Society to erect a monument to the memory of Washington on the public grounds; and by one of its provisions the work was to be carried on under the superintendence of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings. He [Mr. A.] then took the occasion to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia what amount of money the society had on hand to complete the work; and that Senator said that he believed that the sum of thirty thousand dollars had been reported as the amount collected. Thereupon he [Mr. A.] took the occasion to express his surprise at, and utter disbelief in, the correctness of this report. He did not ascribe the embezzlement of the money to any body; but, in reply to some remarks of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] he said that he knew not one single man who had the management of this matter in the city of Washington; and, therefore, could make no personal application to any body. He was aware that the persons who made this report of $30,000 might be ever so honest in doing so, and yet the fact that the money had not been fairly applied might also be true. In what manner had this thing been conducted? The gentlemen who had the management of it were here in the city of Washington. They had not personally had the collecting of this money. They had had almost innumerable agents ransacking the country from one end to the other, some of whom might be good and some bad. He said that he did not believe, nor would the American people believe, that but $30,000 had been contributed by the whole people of the United States, called on in the manner they had been; but he did not know where the fault rested; he charged embezzlement to nobody. But the ground of his surprise at this meagre report of $30,000, this "beggarly account of empty boxes," was this: An object had been proposed to the people of the United States, and that object was the erection of a national monument to the memory of the national man of the country; and the name of Washington was so potential to the American people, went so far to excite their enthusiasm and stimulate their bounty, that the most ample contributions were expected. Besides, it was not only to be a national monument, but it was to be erected at the seat of Government, to stand as the admiration of the world. Added to all this, as the name of Washington was dear to the American people, the conspicuous and influential public men of the country favored the undertaking, and lent to it the sanction of their names; many of them giving letters to the travelling agents, addressed to their friends, requesting them to lend to it their aid. Every means had been resorted to excite the interest and stimulate the bounty of a grateful people. Armed with all this—furnished with letters from high and influential public men, and going out from the capital of the nation, these agents went into the several States of this Union; and what did they do there? In some of the States, he believed, the Executives aided the undertaking; and in his State the Executive, a popular and worthy man, lent the sanction of his official authority to extract the bounty of the people. Sub-agents were appointed for the counties, and with all this the people, so far as he knew, contributed bountifully. His colleague stated that in the county in which he lived $1000 had been collected. He himself stated that so far as his knowledge went, there was not a single individual in his county who had been called on who did not respond by complying with the demand. Under all these circumstances, he did state his disbelief that but $30,000 had been wrung from the hands of a grateful people by such means. He stated that it was a reproach to the liberality of the nation to suppose that but this pitiful sum of $30,000 had been collected from fifteen millions of freemen. He did not state where the fault was, whether it rested with the managers here or with the collecting agents, but there was great probability it was with the latter. Some of the names mentioned of this board of managers, he believed, were highly respectable men—all might be so; but, notwithstanding all this, there was good reason to believe that more money had been collected than was reported. Sir, said Mr. A. the Senate, or at least many of its members, felt this surprise equally strong with himself or his colleague, and the bill was struck down without a division, and for this obvious reason. The scale upon which this work was to be constructed was so large and magnificent, that the cost was estimated at one million of dollars, to be raised from the voluntary contributions of the American people. Every means had been used for two years to excite this bounty, and after all this, they reported that only $30,000 out of the million had been collected. What then must be the consequences of passing this bill? Either that Congress must appropriate the deficiency, because the monument being by its authority on the public grounds, and under the superintendence of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, was in some sort a public work, or the people of the United States must be again visited by hosts of travelling agents, in order to make up the sum wanted. Now every body knew how these things progressed. Give these private individuals to levy contributions on the people of the States—put the work under the control of the public officers, and it will be some national affair. Then, the very next year it will be said that the people have subscribed and not paid, and Congress will be called upon to appropriate $150,000 for the year's work. In a word, Congress must either appropriate the money out of the public purse, or turn loose all this machinery of agents and collectors upon the public, to make up one million of dollars at the rate of $30,000 in two years. These he thought were sufficient reasons why the Senate rejected the bill without a division. He did not attend to the publication of what he said on the subject the other day, but he hoped the reporters had reported it correctly, and he also hoped they would report him correctly now.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he was unwilling to interpose while this discussion was going on, irregular as the Senate must have felt it to be, because the Senators from Ohio had, on other occasions, examples of a similar kind before them. He hoped, however, it would not again be tolerated, and that the presiding officer of the Senate would feel it his duty to check it at once. He hoped the Senate would not, for the sake of its own dignity, to say nothing of its improper interference with the despatch of public and private business now before the body, again tolerate these discussions, founded on newspaper paragraphs. What would it lead to? Look to his own case: he might, if he adopted that course, take up at least one-third of the time of the Senate. He had been induced to make these remarks from the irregularity of the mode of proceeding, and not from any spirit of unkindness, or the least wish to censure the conduct of the two Senators from Ohio; but this he would say, that no paper in this country was conducted with more regard to propriety, decorum, truth, and faithfulness of report, than the National Intelligencer; and he could wish that the other journals of this city, and particularly the one connected with the Government, would look more to this print for example.

Mr. MORRIS observed that, in general, he entirely concurred with the Senator from Kentucky. I do, said he, deem this discussion irregular, and would not have engaged in it if the example had not been set him by some distinguished members of that body. But while the Senator from Kentucky spoke of the correctness of this newspaper, he must have recollected that when some of his [Mr. M's] remarks were incorrectly reported in it some time ago, he undertook to correct them under his own signature; and the Senator would also recollect how that correction was treated by the Editors of the Intelligencer. He would now ask why they had not complied with their promise not to notice any remarks of his again?

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the bill from the House, without amendment, for to extend the time for locating Virginia land warrants and returning surveys thereon.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Hiram Hart, and others: read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported the bill referred to them in relation to the Orphans' Court of the county of Alexandria, D. C. with an amendment, which was read and agreed to; and the bill, by consent, was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill referred to them to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, with an amendment, the design of which was to make the abolition by this bill of imprisonment for debt correspond with its abolition in the respective States where such imprisonment had, in whole or in part, been abolished; which amendment was read, and the bill taken up for consideration.

After a few explanatory remarks by Mr. GRUNDY and by Mr. TALLMADGE, urging the importance of speedy action on the bill,

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, who expressed some doubt as to the practicability of carrying all the provisions of this bill, as it now stood, into effect, and with the assent of Mr. TALLMADGE, the bill was laid on the table till to-morrow, and ordered to be printed, with the amendment.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of David Hopkins and William Grayson's heirs.

The following bills from the House were severally read twice, and referred:

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Samuel Jones, deceased.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Deborah Gannett, a soldier of the Revolution.

The bill for the relief of Eliza Causin, daughter and heir of Colonel John H. Stone, deceased.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, three thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the condition of the State banks, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS presented some additional papers in support of the claim of Margaret Wall, which were referred to the appropriate committee.

The amendments of the House to the bill authorizing the appointment of persons to test the usefulness of inventions for preventing the explosion of the boilers of steamboats, were read, and, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the Senate took up the bill granting pre-emption to the settlers on the public lands, the question being in concurring with the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. LYON moved to amend the amendment, by adding the following, to come in after the word "improvements," in the 16th line: "Or to any lands that may have been sold in good faith to others by persons who fairly and honestly purchased and paid for the same under color of title under any of the pre-emption laws heretofore enacted."

Mr. ROBINSON thought this amendment was going rather too far. If the gentleman would leave out the words "under color of title," and confine himself to titles granted by the United States, he would have no objection.

Mr. LYON said his object was to preserve the rights of innocent purchasers only; and that there would be many of such persons greatly injured, without the adoption of this amendment, or something like it.

Mr. ROBINSON objected that the adoption of the amendment would be undertaking to decide by legislation that which ought to be left to courts of justice; and cited, for example, several cases in which it would lead to great difficulties. He thought it much better to leave the matter where it was, as Congress ought not, and could not, decide it.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky thought the amendment a proper one, as it went to limit the operation of the pre-emption laws, and declare that the present act shall not apply to cases now under a course of adjudication.

Mr. LYON observed that the Senator from Kentucky had stated his object correctly. He did not wish the contested cases to be decided at all, but wished them to be left to the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, before whom they now were.

Mr. SEVIER remarked, that as he understood the matter, all the difficulty had grown out of speculations in town lots. A man lays out a town, and sells out the lots; but it is subsequently found that he had no legal title, and the holders of the lots claim them under the pre-emption laws. To settle this controversy between the proprietor of Milwaukie and the persons who are on it, an amendment is offered that may jeopardize the whole bill. He understood that there were agents here from both parties; one wanting the bill passed with this saving clause, and the other opposing it. Thus, through the hostile claims of these parties, the bill might be jeopardized.

Mr. LYON had no wish to make a law to embrace a particular class of cases only, but he had a general object in view, for there were a great many cases situated like those in the town of Milwaukie. If the amendment was not adopted, the tenants in the houses built by others would get them under this law, though they never paid a cent for them.

Mr. YOUNG observed that the Senator from Michigan might say that his object was a general one, and not intended to apply to a particular class of cases; but such would be the application of it. Why, the substance of this amendment was offered when this bill was before the Senate, and before it passed, and it was then rejected. The claims to this Milwaukie town had been contested on the ground that the floats were illegally laid; and there was no question but they were illegal; in fact, they were set aside as being so. His information was, that there was no dispute about the main body of the town, but that the portion about which the dispute was, contained but an inconsiderable number of houses, and was but a small part of the town. Now, if the claimants had laid their titles according to the laws of the United States, they were safe, and if not, the lands were open to pre-emptions. Mr. Y. referred to the opinions of the President, Attorney General, and Secretary of the Treasury, all agreeing that these floats, having been laid before the ratification of the treaty, were illegal.

Mr. Y. contended that it would be best to leave these titles to be adjudicated by the proper tribunals; and then those persons who had the best claims would get the land.

After some further remarks from Messrs. LYON, HUBBARD, BUCHANAN, YOUNG, ROBINSON, and MORRIS,

Mr. TIPTON observed, that he believed it to be his duty to oppose all amendments to this bill at this stage of the business. The bill was an important one to the whole West. Thousands were interested in it; and he would put the question to Western Senators, to those who were in favor of saving these improvements to the industrious settlers, whether it was not dangerous to make so important a movement at this stage of the proceedings? He was in favor of any restrictions to prevent frauds; but he felt it his duty to oppose so important an amendment at this late hour.

Mr. HUBBARD asked if the Senator was not aware that the Senate had passed a bill carrying out this very principle, and that it was now pending in the other House; and if they did not adopt this amendment, the passage of that bill by the House would have no effect. If the treaty had been ratified, the certificates issued by the land office would have been valid; and under these certificates individuals had improved their tracts, and built upon them—not knowing, until lately, that any decision had been made against them. Now whose fault was this? Not the innocent purchaser to be sure. If the Senator from Indiana succeeded in keeping off further amendments, the bill that had passed here, and to which he had rererred, would be a dead letter; and those individuals, who have been at the trouble and expense of improving the tracts held by them under these certificates, would suffer a total loss. He was perfectly willing to adopt such an amendment as would leave all the conflicting claims unsettled.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, observed, that if those persons, who originally entered this land, did so under the honest belief that they could enter it legally, Congress was bound in justice to confirm their claims. They had acted fairly and honestly; and those persons who from subsequent knowledge availed themselves of the defect in their titles to oust them from their possessions, had no just claims whatever. If Congress confirmed the claims of these last mentioned persons, they would be confirming fraud, instead of preventing it.

Mr. SEVIER contended that the amendment would cut off the first settler instead of the speculator. The first settler being in possession of the land, the speculator comes and lays a float on it, and the legality of this float has been contested ever since the General Land Office having decided against it. The Senator from Connecticut, therefore, in voting for this amendment, would vote to oust the original settler for the benefit of the speculator.

After some remarks from Messrs. PRENTISS and BAYARD,

Mr. LYON, at the suggestion of Mr. BAYARD, withdrew his amendment, and moved to reconsider the vote on Mr. YOUNG's amendment of yesterday, inserting the words "by the United States" after the word "selected," in the thirteenth line of the amendment; and the reconsideration having been ordered,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama observed that he did not wish to prolong this discussion, and that all he wished to say was, that he was candid in the avowal made by him in the beginning—that he did not wish to favor the speculators at all; and, therefore, he had no objection to the amendment of the House of Representatives excluding town sites from the operations of the bill. He now hoped that the bill would be passed as amended by the House, and the slight amendment made at the instance of the Senator from Tennessee, and that it would not be embarrassed by the conflicting claims of speculators.

After some remarks from Messrs. YOUNG, PRENTISS, and CLAY of Alabama,

Mr. KING said that before the vote was taken on this question, he wished to inquire of his friend from Illinois [Mr. YOUNG] whether the individuals who settled on the lands in the first instance, had made application to be allowed their pre-emptions under the existing laws, and had been refused. If that had been the case, and they had not got their pre-emptions under the existing laws, this amendment of the House cuts them off. Any individual who had settled on a quarter section, and who had not got his pre-emption in consequence of the lands not being surveyed, and had laid it out into town lots, would not get his pre-emption if this law passed, under this or any former pre-emption law. The best way for the Senator from Illinois to come at his object, was to withdraw his amendment and offer another, applying to allotments made by citizens, and not by the Government.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that his colleague was mistaken in one point. He went on the assumption that this bill, if passed, would cut off those entitled to pre-emptions under the old laws. Now this was not so. They could not pass a law to divest the interests acquired under the previous laws. As regarded lands that had not been surveyed, the only limitation was as to the time fixed by the President's proclamation for sale. Under the opinion of the Attorney General, the rights of a settler on unsurveyed land to his pre-emption, took effect as soon as the survey was made. The individual's right never became extinct until the day arrived which was fixed on by the proclamation of the President for the sale. He did not believe the inconvenience existed that was imagined by the Senator from Illinois, and he therefore hoped that no amendment would be made to embarrass the bill at this stage of its proceeding, and that it be passed as it came from the House.

Mr. KING said that he had asked the question whether the individuals had made application for their pre-emptions under the existing laws; and stated that, if they had not, they would not be entitled if this bill passed. He was still of that opinion, and the opinion of the Attorney General was with him. Unless the claimant filed his evidence previous to the expiration of the law, he is not entitled.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama still thought his colleague was mistaken. There was no limitation in the law, other than that he had mentioned.

Mr. YOUNG then, with the consent of the Senate, withdrew his amendment, and moved to strike out the following words in the amendment of the House, being from the 12th to the 16th lines "or to any portions of public lands, surveyed or otherwise, which have been actually selected as sites for cities or towns, lotted into smaller quantities than eighty acres, and settled upon, and occupied for the purposes of trade, and not of agricultural cultivation and improvement."

On taking the question, this amendment was rejected—yeas 11, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Grundy, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Roane, Robinson, Wall, White, and Young—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allan, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Williams, and Wright—26.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky stated that the effect of one of the amendments of the other House, which had not been noticed by Senators, was to subject to the provisions of this bill certain lands which had heretofore been always reserved from pre-emption. These were lands which it was supposed might be covered by valid French or Spanish claims; much of which, being near populous settlements, had now become very valuable. Mr. C. especially specified certain lands of this class in the vicinity of St. Louis, which, he said, would sell at once for $10 per acre. Mr. C. in conclusion, moved to disagree to this amendment of the House.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama remarked that this clause was intended to apply to lands that had been reserved from sale, on the false suspicion that they were included in French and Spanish grants; and the honest individuals who were settled on them would have been entitled to pre-emptions under acts of 1833 and 1834, and were now entitled. We are only giving to these persons, said Mr. C. by the amendment, the same rights they would have acquired, but for the false suspicion that the tracts settled by them were covered by French and Spanish grants. It was very questionable with him whether these individuals were not already entitled, whether the amendment was adopted or not, because they were settlers on the public lands; and the pre-emption laws embraced all the public lands.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky; and it was carried—yeas 24, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, White, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Trotter, Wright, and Young—19.

The question was then on concurring with the amendments of the House as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 42, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, and Wright—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Robinson and Young—2.

After the consideration of Executive business, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, June 20, 1838.

PATENT OFFICE.

As soon of the journal was read,

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont asked Mr. ADAMS (who was entitled to the floor) to yield to him for a moment to make a motion, to which Mr. A. assenting, and unanimous leave being granted by the the House,

Mr. F. said he wished to call the attention of the House to the bill reported by him from the Committee on Patents, in addition to "An act to promote the useful arts." It was a public bill of considerable importance to the facility of the business of the Patent Office, though it only involved a few hundred dollars of expense. Its consideration would not occupy more than half an hour, and he would move to make it the order for Friday next, after the morning business was disposed of, for the space of half an hour only.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio objecting, the motion was propounded, but it was disagreed to—two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. HAMER, on leave, presented a petition from an individual who had been brought to this city from N. W. Ohio, by the officers of Government, to testify in a late case, setting forth that the officers of the Government declined to pay him, on the alleged reason of a want of power, and that he was now here without the means of returning home. The petition was, on Mr. H's motion, referred to the Committee of Claims.

TEXAS.

Mr. ADAMS resumed his remarks on the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the annexation of Texas. The question pending being on the motion to recommit, with instructions, by Mr. CUSHING and Mr. THOMPSON, as heretofore printed. Mr. A. had not concluded when the orders of the day were called for.

On motion of Mr. BOON, the House took up the Senate's amendment to the third amendment of the House to the "pre-emption right bill," which relates to the Spanish grants.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri, said he would not jeopardize the bill by insisting on the House's amendment, though he could not help adverting to the partiality of excluding the class of settlers embraced in that provision, and he would avail himself of this occasion to say that he would take an early opportunity of bringing it before the House.

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House again went into Committee on the Union, on the "bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue."

The question was on the motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia to strike therefrom the enacting clause, and that gentleman being entitled to the floor, gave way, at his solicitation, to

Mr. BRONSON, who, on leave, laid on the table the following amendment he proposed to submit when in order:

Strike out all of the twentieth section, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the operation of the following parts of acts or provisions of law now in force, shall be, and the same are hereby, suspended for the space of two years, to wit: so much of the act of June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," as provides that the notes or bills of any bank which has, since the 4th July, 1836, issued any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars, shall not be received in payment of any debt due to the United States; and so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836," passed 14th April, 1836, as provides that no bank note of a less denomination than twenty dollars shall be offered in payment in any case whatsoever in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department.

Mr. GARLAND then proceeded, and addressed the committee at great length in opposition to the principle of the proposed measure, and in support of the State bank system. He first replied to Mr. CAMBRELENG, and questioned the conclusions to which that gentleman had arrived, especially that wherein he had affirmed that, while the Independent Treasury system was in full force, the prosperity of the country was fast returning to its wonted condition. Mr. G. then went on to reply to Mr. PICKENS, and asserted that that gentleman had made a false issue. The contest was not between the banks and the people, but between the Government and the banks, the former being in the situation of the wolf in the fable, which, being up the stream, quarrelled with the lamb which was below for muddying the water: the banks were in the situation of the lamb.

Mr. G. then went into a variety of statements and statistical details in support of the positions assumed by him, and expatiated at great length upon the evils that he felt would accrue from the adoption of the divorce scheme, which, he contended, would be the perpetuation of a connection far more dangerous than had ever grown out of that of Government with the banks.

The House then took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House met, according to the order, at half past three o'clock, and went into committee upon the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. DROMGOOLE went into an argument at length in favor of the principles of the bill. He urged the impropriety of being governed by precedent and usage against the light of experience, and in opposition to new convictions of truth and duty. He then went into an extended examination of the principles of taxation and expenditure, and reviewed with great force the opinions of able political economists upon the general subjects of collecting, keeping, and disbursing, the national revenue. The different arguments upon these topics were brought to bear favorably upon the principles of the bill, and were supported by quotations from the most correct authorities upon subjects of financial measures.

Mr. S. S. PRENTISS then took the floor, and suggested that he desired to address the committee. He said if the committee desired to rise, he would postpone his remarks till to-morrow, but he was willing to go on, in part, then.

Mr. WISE moved that the committee rise; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 65.

Mr. PRENTISS then proceeded to offer some remarks in opposition to the bill; when, after continuing some time, he gave way to

Mr. WISE, who again moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailed.

The committee then rose and reported progress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th inst, reports from the Secretary of State, Treasury, and War, and the documents referred to by them respectively. It will be seen that the outrages committed on the steamboat Sir Robert Peel, under the British flag, within the waters of the United States, and upon the steamboat Telegraph, under the American flag, at Rockville, in Upper Canada, have not been followed by any demand of either Government on the other for redress. These acts have been so far treated on each side as criminal offences, committed within the jurisdiction of tribunals competent to inquire into the facts, and to punish the persons concerned in them. Investigations have been made, some of the individuals inculpated have been arrested, and prosecutions are in progress, the result of which cannot be doubted. The excited state of public feeling on the borders of Canada, on both sides of the line, has occasioned the most painful anxiety to this Government. Every effort has been, and will be, made to prevent the success of the design apparently formed, and in course of execution by Canadians who have found a refuge within our territory, aided by a few reckless persons of our own country, to involve the nation in a war with a neighboring and friendly power. Such design cannot succeed while the two Governments appreciate, and confidently rely upon, the good faith of each other in the performance of their respective duties. With a fixed determination to use all the means in my power to put a speedy and satisfactory termination to these border troubles, I have the most confident assurances of the cordial co-operation of the British authorities, at home and in the North American possessions, in the accomplishment of a purpose so sincerely and earnestly desired by the Governments and people, both of the United States and Great Britain.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, June 20, 1838.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, the message and accompanying reports were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMER, by general consent, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims inquire into the expediency of allowing Richard F. Barrett to perfect by purchase his claim to fractional section 4, in township 4 north, of range 9, west of the 4th principal meridian, in the State of ———

On motion of Mr. GRENNELL,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, June 20, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented three memorials from the citizens of Philadelphia and Philadelphia county, all praying for the immediate passage of the Independent Treasury bill, and remonstrating against the establishment of a Bank of the United States: laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE presented the petition of Jacob Peck and others, praying an alteration in the time of holding the terms of the Circuit Courts of the United States for the eighth district of Tennessee: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING presented documents relating to the petition of Samuel H. Thorpson; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, presented the petition of sundry commanders of steamboats and others engaged in the navigation between the cities of New Orleans and Mobile, asking the establishment of light-houses and light-boats on Dauphin Island, and other points to render the navigation between those cities more safe: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the settlement of the accounts of Wm. B. Stokes, surviving partner of Stockton and Stokes, and surviving partner of J. N. C. Stockton, accompanied by a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the bill from the House making appropriations for certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin, with amendments, and gave notice that he would, on Friday next, ask to consider the same.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Horatio N. Crabb, of the Marine Corps; which was concurred in.

Mr. R. from the same committee, also reported the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Elizabeth Champney, without amendment; but gave notice that when it came up he should move for its indefinite postponement.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the House of Representatives authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase a site for a magazine in the District of Columbia, and a keeper's house, without amendment.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Gratia Ray, without amendment, and recommended its passage.

Mr. MOUTON moved that the bills relating to private and public land claims, be considered on Friday; many of which, he said, it was right should be acted on at once.

Mr. KNIGHT did not know what there was in these bills to entitle them to preference. Why not let them take their places on the calendar?

Mr. MOUTON said he would not have asked to have taken them up, were he not convinced that they would not consume the time of the Senate. The most of them were very plain cases, not involving any principle likely to lead to discussion; but, at the same time, were highly interesting to a large portion of the community.

Mr. BENTON would inform the Senate that it was not a private bill which the Senator from Louisiana asked to be considered on Friday, but a whole class of bills, some of which had been before the country for the last thirty-four years in one shape or other; and he desired to have them taken up on that day.

Mr. TIPTON expressed his unwillingness to oppose the motion; but if Senators were to be indulged in taking bills out of the regular order, they would all be held to claim precedence. He was opposed to this mode of proceeding, unless for some very special reason.

Mr. NORVELL expressed his wish that the Senator from Louisiana should be gratified in having those bills taken up on the day named.

The question was then taken and agreed to.

The bill relating to the Orphans' Court of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. GRUNDY said there was a bill laid on the table yesterday, at the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, in relation to the abolishment of imprisonment for debt in certain cases. Mr. G. expressed himself as favourable to the bill, and said that if it were to be passed this session it could not be acted on too speedily; and he, therefore, moved to take it up.

The question was on the amendment, viz: making the matter correspond with those States where the said abolition of imprisonment had in whole or in part been abolished.

Mr. PRESTON opposed the amendment at some length. He thought its action would not be equal. He wished legislation to be on one broad, general, and uniform principle, not partial in its operation. He was opposed to the amendment for that reason, and he was also opposed to the whole principle of the bill. He thought we were getting wise and humane beyond the experience of the age; and if such a bill were passed, it would be doing a manifest injury to the creditor. He desired gentlemen to look to the consequences likely to flow from such a system, and pause before they lent it their sanction. He would not give his vote for any bill advocating such a measure, and more especially one with such an amendment.

Mr. TALLMADGE would not go into a discussion of the general merits of this bill. The time of the Senate was too precious, at this juncture, to be taken up with protracted discussions of subjects on which the mind of every Senator was made up. He would ask the Senator from South Carolina if he was prepared to say that citizens travelling from different parts of the United States to that commercial emporium, New York, should be arrested and imprisoned for debt, as felons, through a process of the United States courts, when the State of New York herself had abolished the whole odious system? Yes, said Mr. T. the grand jury had already presented the cases of twenty-three citizens, incarcerated in the prison of New York, who were among strangers, and unable to procure bail.

Mr. BAYARD felt disposed to vote against the bill, because he conceived it useless legislation. The laws of the United States already provided for the cases of insolvents. If a man had property, he had to surrender that property; or, if he were without property, all he had to do was to present himself to the district judge, make oath of his inability in proper form, and the judge would grant him a certificate of discharge.

He took it for granted that no Senator would be willing to confine a man, who was unable to pay his debts—shut him up in prison until he was able. But if the law were dispensed with, the worst consequences would follow, and innumerable frauds take place under its provisions. There were species of property which could not be reached in any other way, than by retaining the laws of imprisonment for debt. A man might have ten times the amount he owed in his pocket, and laugh at his creditors. It was necessary to compel some persons to be honest, or, at least, to guard the honest creditor from fraud.

Mr. NORVELL said that the thanks of the country were due to the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] for bringing forward this bill; and he only regretted that the measure did not precede, instead of following State legislation upon this important subject. He was sorry that it did not extend to States in which imprisonment for debt had not been abolished, as well as to States which had abolished it. The principle of imprisonment for debt was a remnant of barbarism, unworthy of the country and of the age. It ought not, for one moment, to be suffered to dishonor our statute books. It had been said that the bill would give rise to frauds. Sir, had the abolition of imprisonment for debt in Kentucky, increased the amount of fraud in that State. Had it not diminished it? Were not debts more easily collected; was not the whole business of the State in a better condition; had not a more nice sense of honor been introduced into the transactions between man and man, since Kentucky had erased from her code the barbarous principle in question, than had been the case before? Sir, it had been properly said by a friend to his right [Mr. NICHOLAS,] that the abolition of imprisonment had reduced the circle of debt. It had done so, and the results had been beneficial to the people, and to the prosperity of the State. He trusted that the bill would pass, and that its provisions would soon be rendered universal by the legislation of the American Congress.

Mr. BAYARD said, in reply, he was not advocating imprisonment for debt as a punishment; that, he admitted, would be a relic of barbarism; but as the means of securing the honest creditor from the fraudulent debtor. The Senator from New York had said that persons were imprisoned as felons; that he apprehended could not be the case; the prison bounds of New York, he believed, were extended to the precincts of the whole city.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he alluded to those citizens who, when travelling to the city of New York, had been arrested on mesne process, and being strangers, were alike unable to give bail for their appearance, or for the privilege of the bounds, and were consequently shut up in close confinement as felons were.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

The bill was further amended at the suggestion of Mr. PRENTISS, when

Mr. SEVIER asked for the yeas and nays on its engrossment; when there appeared for the measure 36, against it 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, White, Williams, and Wright—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Preston, and Roane—4.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLAS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the temporary landing and warehousing of the cargoes of such vessels as may enter the ports of the United States, after having been warned off the coast of Mexico by the blockading squadron.

On motion of Mr. KING,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Springfield, Sumpter county, in the State of Alabama, to Benevola, Bowman's Mills, Carrollton, and Yorkville, to Columbus, in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. GRUNDY introduced a resolution, which lies over one day, in relation to changing the hour of meeting of the Senate to 11 o'clock.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. WILLIAMS's motion for leave to bring in a bill to provide for the survey and determination of the Northeastern boundary of the United States according to the treaty of 1783.

The debate on this subject was continued by Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, BUCHANAN, DAVIS, WRIGHT, CALHOUN, and RIVES.

Leave was granted, and the bill was introduced and read twice.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that, considering the importance of the question to Maine, and that her Senators and Representatives were requested by her Legislature to urge the passage of the bill which had then been read, he felt it to be his duty to move its reference to a select committee. Mr. S. did this without intending the least disrespect to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the Senator from New York had proposed the reference, and to which, under other circumstances, there would be an obvious propriety in committing the bill. But it could not have escaped the notice of the Senate that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the course of the debate, had stated his opinion that if the bill should go to that committee it would probably keep it without making a report, or report it back to the Senate with notice that, when it should come up for consideration, he would move its indefinite postponement. With this frank avowal of the sentiments of the chairman of that committee, it would be a dereliction of duty on his part to consent that the bill should go to a committee from which there was no prospect of a favorable report; and, for this cause, he moved the reference of the bill to a select committee.

Mr. DAVIS advocated its reference to a special committee, on the ground that the chairman and another most prominent member of the Committee on Foreign Relations had already declared themselves hostile to the bill, and that both courtesy and equity demanded that it should at least go to an impartial committee.

Messrs. WRIGHT, RIVES, CALHOUN, and BUCHANAN, advocated its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the ground that it involved questions of high import in regard to our foreign relations.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky urged that it should take that course which, if possible, should obtain the unanimous approbation of the Senate; union of action being more important than any particular manner of action.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that he would gladly yield to the wishes expressed by Senators, and withdraw his proposition to refer this bill to a select committee, and thereby secure that unanimity of action upon this important subject which Senators regard as exceedingly desirable; but seeing the fate that awaits the bill, if referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, he could not comply with those wishes without disregarding the instructions of his State, under which he was acting. Whatever might be the decision of the Senate upon the question of reference, he should be disposed to acquiesce in it; and he felt confident that Maine would see in the discussions that had been had upon the question of her boundary, a disposition in the Senate of the United States to understand the merits of her claims, and a patriotic and resolute determination to maintain them and the integrity of the State to their full extent.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Senate adjourned, after an Executive session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVS,

THURSDAY, June 21, 1838.

Mr. HOFFMAN asked to be excused from serving on the select committee appointed on the memorial of Mr. Blair. Mr. H. stated, as a reason for the request he made, that he was now a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and if the question now under consideration on the report of that committee should prevail, the reading, considering, and digesting of so many memorials, remonstrances, resolutions, and other papers on the subject of the annexation of Texas, would consume a great deal of their time for the balance of the session. Moreover, there was much other business before that committee, in which his constituents were deeply interested, and for these reasons, therefore, he prayed the House to excuse him, which was agreed to, and the vacancy directed to be filled up.

Mr. HAMER asked a similar favor of the House, not on the ground of having much press of business upon his hands, but because he expected to be absent before the end of the session. Mr. H. was consequently excused, and the vacancy ordered to be filled by the CHAIR.

Mr. PAYNTER, on leave, presented a petition from Philadelphia, as was understood, in favor of the Sub-Treasury bill, and the proceedings of a public meeting against it, which were referred to the same Committee of the Whole having charge of that bill, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YORKE, also, on leave, presented a petition.

TEXAS.

Mr. ADAMS resumed his remarks in opposition to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the annexation of Texas, and in support of the motion to recommit it with certain instructions as heretofore printed. Mr. A. again gave way, without concluding to the orders of the day.

The amendment of the Senate (being merely a verbal one) to the bill relating to the Orphan's Court of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, concurred in.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, on the above bill, the pending question being on striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi, who was entitled to the floor, gave way to

Mr. DUNCAN, who, by leave, laid on the table the following amendment, which he gave notice he should move to that of Mr. THOMPSON, heretofore printed:

Provided, That in no event shall any bank be selected as a depository of the public money, or the notes of any bank be received in payment of the public dues, in which bank any member of Congress is a stockholder, or of which any such member is an officer, director, agent, or attorney, at the time of the passage of this act, or at any time when solicitations of banks as depositories are to be made, or the notes of banks tendered in payment of the public dues; and if, after any bank has been selected as a depository, or the notes of any bank have been received in payment of the public dues, any member of the present Congress, or any member of Congress for the time being, shall become a stockholder in, or an officer, director, agent, or attorney, of such bank, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury forthwith to discontinue such bank as such depository, and to discontinue the receipt of the notes of such bank in payment of the public dues.

Mr. PRENTISS then resumed the course of his remarks in opposition to the bill, and, without concluding, continued till the House, at two o'clock, took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

At the usual hour the House met, and went again into Committee for the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. PRENTISS resumed, and continued to address the committee, till near six o'clock, when he concluded.

Mr. RHETT then took the floor, and moved that the committee rise, but consented to withdraw the motion, if Mr. HUNTER, who rose at the same time, was prepared, and desired to go on at that time.

The motion to rise, being called for, was put; and being taken by tellers, they reported ayes 67, noes 66. The CHAIR voted in the negative; so the motion to rise was lost.

Mr. HUNTER then proceeded for some time to address the committee in favor of the bill; when he gave way to Mr. HOPKINS, who moved that the committee rise, which motion prevailed.

On motion of Mr. DUNCAN, the amendment, proposed by him, to be offered when it should be in order, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPLER presented a memorial, which referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, June 21, 1838.

The journal of the Senate having been read,

Mr. LUMPKIN rose from his seat and said:

Mr. President, I have, through a long course of public life, generally borne in silence the many gross misrepresentations which have been levelled against my character through the medium of newspapers. I have relied upon my conduct as sufficient to put down false imputation and slander. But a case has now arisen which, to my mind, demands my notice.

From the time I took my seat in the Senate up to the present morning, nothing which I have said in debate here has been correctly reported in the columns of the National Intelligencer, except when corrected by myself. I have not only on several occasions been represented to speak nonsense which I never uttered, but more than once what I did say has been so perverted, as directly to reverse my real opinions. But having no personal unkind feelings to either editors or reporters of that paper, and knowing of no cause of unkind feelings from them to me, I have passed over these errors in a spirit of forbearance, and without public complaint. I have, however, read in the Intelligencer of this morning, what purports to be a report of the discussion which took place in the Senate, on the 7th instant, on the bill making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities; and so far as my name is connected with the report, manifest injustice has been done me. I am not only presented in a manner to place me out of my true position, on that occasion, but I am represented as having contradicted myself in the presence of this Senate, by alternately admitting, and denying, that the propositions of the Secretary of War, were intended to allow the Indians two years longer time to remain in the States. This is wholly false. I contended throughout the whole discussion, that the object of the Government in trying to conciliate Ross, was not to delay, but rather to hasten the removal of the Indians in peace, and that the only time asked from the States was that which might be required by humanity, and a due regard to the reasonable comfort of the Indians.

Moreover, the debate, as reported in the Intelligencer, seems to place me in the light of having unkindly attacked the Governor of Georgia, and of having provoked a reply from the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] Now I appeal to the Senate, and to you, Mr. President, to say whether the whole of my remarks were not in the nature of a reply to the Senator from South Carolina, as heretofore reported under my own correction. And to this Senate I appeal for the accuracy of the report, as corrected by myself. My remarks consist chiefly of a statement of facts, no one of which, as sanctioned by me, has or can be controverted.

I should not have said a word on the occasion referred to, but for the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, which I considered as having an unjustifiable bearing on the Administration as well as myself.

My object was, in the discussion referred to, to place all the important facts before the Senate and the country—without any design whatever to act unkindly to any one whatever. And I now in my place, defy any human being whatever, to controvert successfully the truth of any fact stated in my remarks on the subject, as reported under my own correction. I will not quietly suffer myself on this subject, to be borne down by newspaper imputations and insinuations, founded in falsehood, and a spirit of misrepresentation. If I have erred in this whole matter, (which I deny,) I ask for direct and tangible charges. I am ready to meet all such charges.

Mr. McKEAN presented the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting of Democratic citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, on the subject of the Independent Treasury bill pending before Congress, the nomination of David R. Porter for the office of Governor, and the interference of Government office holders in primary assemblies of the people: ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented four memorials from citizens of Philadelphia county and city, in favor of the passage of the Independent Treasury bill, and against the incorporation of a National Bank: laid on the table.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of Marshal A. Mathias, praying to be indemnified for the loss of a schooner, wrecked while engaged in transporting provisions for the United States: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRIS presented the petition of certain citizens of Ohio, asking for the establishment of a post route: referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. M. also presented documents, relating to the claim of Catharine White, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KING presented the petition of W. W. Fry, praying to be allowed to import two iron steamboats free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following, and asked for its consideration at that time:

Resolved, That the use of the Senate Chamber, between the hours of 9 and 11 o'clock, a. m. on Friday next, be allowed to Doctor Sherwood and Doctor Dwight, for the purposes of explaining and demonstrating the discovery which the former conceives he has made of the laws which regulate the variation of the magnetic needle, and of the means of thence deducing at any time, by a simple and infallible process, the latitude and longitude of any point on the globe.

Mr. NORVELL rose to inquire whether the Hall had ever been opened for such purposes before? If it had not been, he was opposed to opening it on the present occasion.

Mr. TALLMADGE did not anticipate any objection, particularly as the hours were such as not to interfere with their duties. The machine was a most extraordinary one, and if it turned out to be what it was represented, would prove a great acquisition to the cause of science.

Mr. KING saw no necessity for granting the Hall; if it were intended for the Senate only, it might not make much odds; but if it were to be public, it might lead to the derangement of the papers and documents with which the desks at present abounded. That the machine was a very extraordinary one, he was willing to admit; still he thought that the granting of the Hall would be of no advantage to the inventors or the public, while it would lead to the misplacing of papers, &c.

Mr. SEVIER said he objected to it. If the Hall were once opened, they would be continually pestered by applications for abolition lectures, and other things of that kind. He was for keeping the Hall for what it was originally designed.

Mr. NILES, presented resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, requesting their Senators to procure the passage of a law to indemnify the citizens of the United States for losses sustained by them from the French, prior to 1800: laid on the table.

Also, a preamble and resolutions relating to the right of petition, and requesting their representatives to use their best endeavors to have the resolutions of the House rescinded relative to petitions on the subject of domestic slavery: laid on the table.

Also, to use their best endeavors to procure an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, so that the nominating, appointing, or removing any officers of the United States, except naval and military officers, ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls, shall not appertain to the office of President of the United States, but be vested and exercised in some other manner: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, declaring it to be the will of the said State that their Senators and representatives vote against the Independent Treasury bill, now pending before Congress, and instructing them to vote accordingly: ordered that they lie on the table.

Mr. NILES offered a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, instructing the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress, that it was the will of the Legislature of the State, that they vote against the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. NILES remarked, that from the importance of the measure to which this resolution referred, as well as from the peculiar character of the resolution itself, he considered it a duty to detain the Senate with some observations, in explanation of the course he felt bound to pursue, and the considerations which had influenced his determination. It was well known that the bill referred to, was now under consideration in the other branch of Congress, or the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House; and should that bill receive the favorable action of that branch of Congress, it would of course come here for the action of the Senate. And from the known sentiments of this body on the question, it was apparent that the fate of the bill would depend on his vote, and that of his colleague. In this view of the subject, the resolution he had to submit to the Senate had thrown upon him and his colleague a heavy responsibility. Of the magnitude of this responsibility, he believed they were fully sensible. Deeply impressed with it, he and his colleague had consulted together, and calmly and deliberately reflected on the course which they ought to pursue under the circumstances in which they found themselves placed.

The measure in question had agitated the public mind for more than a year; it was almost universally regarded as one of vital importance to the currency and business of the country, as well in its bearing on the financial interests of the Government. Its fate might depend on his vote, and that of his colleague; the country therefore, as well as their State, may have a deep interest in the vote they may give; their immediate constituents had no more interest in this measure than the country at large, and the vote he and his colleague might give was of equal importance to the whole country as to them. It was this consideration, which induced him to trouble the Senate with the matter. Under other circumstances, the resolution he had to present would have raised a question between himself and his colleague, and their constituents only. As it is, the country, as well as the State he had the honor to represent, have a direct and important interest in the vote he might feel it a duty to give.

His own opinion, and that of his colleague, were well known on this subject; if at liberty to act according to their own judgments, it was apparent what that action would be. Ought this act of the Legislature of the State to overrule and control their action? This was the question upon which he and his colleague had reflected seriously and anxiously, and with a deep sense of the responsibility of their situation. The result of these reflections, and the reasons and considerations on which those results rested, he proposed to submit to the Senate and the country. If there is any principle of acknowledged authority by which his vote ought to be controlled, then the country, as well as his State, is entitled to the benefits to such principle, which, under the circumstances of the case, would defeat the bill referred to, should it come before the Senate. If there is no such principle, then the country, as well as his constituents, were entitled to his vote, to be given according to his own judgment. Or, if there be any such principle, yet if the resolution he had to present does not come fairly and fully within the principle, then his constituents and the country had a right to his vote, according to his own best judgment.

The resolution he presented was of an unusual character, and not only raised the general question of the authority and binding force of the doctrine of legislative instruction, but other questions growing out of the peculiar character of the resolution, and the circumstances under which it was adopted. Its phraseology was unusual, he believed unprecedented; and, he was sorry to have occasion to add, bore on its face evidence of studied and intentional ambiguity. It is neither a request, nor an instruction, in the common language, but an instruction of what is the will of the Legislature. But, on the passage of the resolution, an amendment was offered expressly asserting the right of instruction, which was voted down by the same majority that voted for the resolution. It is a resolution coming from a Legislature which expressly denied all right and authority to pass it; which, in the very act of its passage, disavows the principle by which alone it could possess any authority, or binding force.

Sir, (said Mr. N.) to permit such a proceeding as this to control his vote would be to suffer himself to become an instrument to destroy the principle of instruction itself. It would be to give a sanction to a gross perversion and palpable abuse of a popular doctrine, which, when properly understood, and fairly and honestly applied, he sincerely respected. The Legislature deny the right of instruction, and then pass a resolution couched in such equivocal terms, that whether they regarded it as instructing us or not, it is evident they intended, or at least supposed, we might so regard it. He had witnessed such a proceeding with pain and regret, and would not speak of it in the language it deserved. It was, in his judgment, unworthy of an enlightened and intelligent Legislature, and inconsistent with that frankness and fairness which ought to characterize every act of legislation.

To present a more full and complete view of his sentiments and those of his colleague, he should be obliged to trouble the Senate with reading a response to the resolution, addressed by himself and his colleague to the majority of the Legislature. He was aware that from its length it would be tedious to the Senate, yet the responsibility which the resolution had thrown upon him and his colleague, and their desire to place themselves right before their constituents and the country, or at least fully to explain the considerations which would influence their action, he must offer as an apology. The letter would form a part of his speech; and as his friend from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] often tells us that he will speak from a book, he (Mr. N.) would speak from the paper he held in his hand. Mr. N. then read the following paper, making some explanations and remarks as he proceeded:

WASHINGTON, June, 1838.

To the majority of the General Assembly of Connecticut, who voted for a resolution to instruct the Senators and Representatives of the State in Congress that it was their will that they should vote against a bill commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill.

GENTLEMEN: We have each of us received from his Excellency the Governor, a certified copy of the resolution above referred to; the extraordinary character of which, and the condition in which it has placed us, as the representatives of the State in that branch of Congress to which the principle of instruction is supposed to be more appropriately applicable, have, in our judgment, rendered it necessary for us to explain to you and to the people of the State our views on this subject, and the considerations which will influence our action under the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed by the aforesaid act of the General Assembly.

The resolution is in the following words:

"Whereas, a bill called the Sub-Treasury, or Independent Treasury bill, is now pending before Congress; and whereas said bill, in the opinion of this Assembly, is in its character and tendency contrary to the spirit of our free institutions, dangerous to our liberties, and destructive of our dearest interests; and will, if passed into a law, still further derange the currency, prostrate business, spread ruin and desolation through all classes of society, and change the present distress into a settled and deep-rooted despair:

"And whereas, if said bill becomes a law, it will provide one currency for office holders and an inferior one for the people: therefore,

"Resolved, That it is the will of this General Assembly that our Senators and Representatives in Congress vote against said bill, or any other containing similar provisions, and use all legal and proper means to prevent the passage thereof; and that they he, and they hereby are, so instructed."

This resolution is couched in unusual and awkward terms; the reason of which we might have been unable to discover, was it not for the history of the proceeding.

We find the following report of the proceedings on this resolution in the House of Representatives:

"Mr. CLEAVELAND moved to take up the resolution partly instructing, and partly not instructing, our Senators and members of Congress in relation to the Sub-Treasury bill. It was taken up, and Mr. C. moved to amend the resolution so as to read: 'Resolved, That inasmuch as this Assembly recognises the right of instruction;' when Mr. TYLER rose in an instant, and said he was opposed to the amendment, and that the resolution, as reported by the committee, recognised no such right; neither did the House intend to recognise the odious doctrine of the right of instruction. Mr. CLEAVELAND said he little thought the proposition would set the gentleman into such a feverish excitement. He was in hopes the gentleman would have been easy one moment, for him to explain his object in offering the amendment. Why, the gentleman says the resolution does not recognise the right of instruction—the odious right, as he calls it. He was obliged to the gentleman for his sagacity in making the discovery. He announced it with an air of great self-importance, as though no one else knew its meaning. What does the gentleman think I offered the amendment for? He said he knew very well that the resolution recognised no such right, and that was the reason which induced him to offer the amendment. He said he only wished to know what the House intended by the passage of the resolution, and if they decided it was not to instruct, he should be satisfied. He concluded by calling for the yeas and nays; which was lost. Mr. MCCURDY then moved to lay the amendment on the table. The CHAIR decided that the motion was out of order, and stated that the gentleman unquestionably had the right of the decision of the House on the amendment. Mr. CATLIN then moved to amend the amendment, which the CHAIR decided out of order. Question on the amendment of Mr. CLEAVELAND lost, by a party vote: resolution then passed by 151 to 32."

It thus appears that the amendment offered to the resolution was violently opposed by some of you, and was negatived by nearly the same members who subsequently voted for the passage of the resolution. This amendment asserted the right of the Legislature to instruct the Senators of the State in Congress, and the existence of the right on the part of the Legislature is claimed to carry with it the consequent obligation, on the part of the Senators, to obey. By voting down this amendment, you expressly deny the right of the Legislature to instruct; and, after recording this denial on your journal, you immediately proceed to exercise the very power which you had expressly declared that you did not possess. It would seem, therefore, that the unusual language of the resolution was to be accounted for from the embarrassment of your situation, being about to do an act which you had expressly declared you had not the right to do.

There are two forms of resolutions of this kind; one simply requesting the Senators to support and vote for a particular measure; or to oppose and vote against a particular measure; the other, in express terms, to instruct them to do the same thing. This is not a mere difference in form or language, but a difference in substance; as a parliamentary meaning and import have become attached to the word "instruct," when used in resolutions of this kind. It would be wanting in respect for your intelligence to suppose that you were ignorant of this distinction. Moreover, we have received copies of three other resolutions, passed by the same Legislature, all of which are in the common form of a simple request; one is in these words:

"Resolved, That the members of the Senate of the United States, and the Representatives in Congress from this State, be requested to use their influence to procure the passage of a law to indemnify the citizens of the United States for losses sustained by them from the French prior to September 30, 1800."

It is evident, therefore, that you were well acquainted with the forms usually employed in such proceedings, and understood well the substantial difference between a resolution of instruction and one of mere request. Why, then, we must be permitted to ask, was this resolution drawn up in such unusual phraseology? Why were we told "that it was the will of the General Assembly that our Senators and Representatives in Congress should vote against said bill?" If it was intended to instruct us, why was it not done in express terms and in the common form which practice has sanctioned? If nothing more was meant than to request us to vote against said bill, why did you not say so in express terms? Was language so unusual and equivocal made use of with the expectation that we might regard it as an express and positive instruction, whilst you might put a different construction on the language, and avoid committing yourselves on the right of instruction? Was it your object to control our action by the application of a principle which you may have supposed we respected, but which you disavowed, and even regarded as an "odious doctrine?" We are unwilling to believe this, as it would be a course of finessing and quibbling wholly inconsistent with those undisguised purposes, and that frank and honest course of proceeding, which should always characterize every act of legislation. Yet, with all possible respect to the General Assembly, we feel constrained to say that the unusual and ambiguous phraseology of the resolution, and the circumstances before referred to, attending its adoption, seem to authorize this opinion.

But whatever may have been the motive which induced the peculiar phraseology of the resolution, the prompt rejection of the amendment, by the same members who passed the resolution, would seem to be conclusive evidence that you did not believe in the right of instruction. You have in the most explicit manner so declared. It then follows, as a necessary conclusion, either that you did not consider the resolution as an instruction, which was to be obligatory upon us, or that you have attempted to exercise a power, which you had expressly declared, you did not possess. The respect which we feel for the majority of the General Assembly, would induce us to adopt the former branch of the alternative, and consider that you intended the resolution as nothing more, than an expression of the opinion of the Legislature, which was not designed to be binding upon us.

In this view of the subject our course is a plain one, as we are very ready to say, that this solemnly expressed opinion of the Assembly will receive from us all the consideration to which it is entitled; and in case we should be in any degree doubtful as to the course which the interests of the State and the Union required us to pursue, in regard to the measure referred to, the opinion of the Legislature would have a controlling influence on our judgments. And so far as the General Assembly has given any reasons for their will or opinion, they will also be duly weighed, and the opinion expressed will be either strengthened or weakened, according as those reasons shall appear to be well founded or not. More than this, we apprehend, the General Assembly will not expect, if their object was what we have supposed it to be.

But as it is possible that we may be mistaken in the view we have taken of the subject, and that you did intend the resolution as an instruction, binding on the Senators and Representatives, it becomes necessary for us to go farther, in explaining the course we feel bound to pursue. If such was the intention of the majority, it will then appear that you have attempted to control the action of the Senators and Representatives of the State, by the application to them, of a principle, the justice and propriety of which you disavow, and even hold to be odious.
